To steal repose? Oh! listen to the sound!

Impetuous rushing on the prison'd ear, --Like trembling symphonies at once unbound In joy and fear. Now on night's breast it faints, And round a parting requiem seems to pour,

As moon-light waves seek in their dying plaints The silent shore. Art thou the breath of hope, Glad but uncertain in her promise fair,

And yet whose magic voice can ever cope With our despair? Or art thou memory's moan, When sighing strings such lingering murmur tell,--Restoring dreams of joy too early flown And loved too well?

Vainly I question thee !-Again I hear thy voice, again thy sigh; Oh! air-harp wild, must these forever be Thy sole reply?
