NOTICE.

From the Boston Recorder. THE LAST WALK.

"I supported my sister to take her final walk in the garden. It was a fine evening in the month of June, and the garden of which she was particularly fond, was dressed in its best array. The voices of manifold birds, happy beyoud utterance, were pouring out their living strains of joy, love and harmony. My little children, as bappily as they, were playing on the dazied lawn. "She earefully visited all her favorite plants, she spoke of them with more admiration than ever before; and we jointly paid them any little attention which they happened to require. At length her measure of strength was exhausted, and we turned towards our quiet habitation. The big tears started from ber eyelids, and were again suppressed. "One last look, brother!" said she as she turned round to the spot which had so often contributed to her innocent gratification. It was indeed the last look that she was taking, and she entered the cottage to come out no more." . [Martha .- By the Rev. Dr. Reed.

The vernal eve was soft and pure. The cottage garden fair : And feeble was her step who sought To breathe its balmy air : Upon her brother's arm she lean'd. That arm from childhood dear .-And tenderly her plaintive tone Rose murmuring to his ear.

The birds with merry warbling seem'd Her languid heart to cheer, The robin, by her bounty fed Confiding, hover'd near, And 'mid the incense breathing flowers, And 'neath the embowring shade, The infant nurslings that she lov'd, In sportive gambols played.

Grey twilight o'er the hovering scene A hidden curtain threw, And in its ruby cup, the rose Receiv'd the freshning dew : Yet still that lingering form was seen With wearied steps to stray, All pensive, as a parting friend, Was it the last walk-say ?

It was. The tear drop on her cheek, In pearly richness bore The language of her deep farewell. Who trod those paths no more ;-But her next walk-mid brighter flowers, In holier climes than this-The scraph habitants of Heaven Alone can tell its bliss. L. H. S.

OR THE THIRD SEASON. 'Yes: he shall propose this season, and then I shall have the gratification, the delight, the exquisite triumph of refusing him. It will only serve him right !". Such was the language of Florence Neville's eyes as she contemplated, with no little satisfaction, the graceful reflection of her figure in the glass, before which she was attiring for the first ball of the season.

Of whom was she speaking? of whom thinking? Why did that short rosy lip curl with such beautiful score as the last look was lacefolds like summer clouds round the fairy pose?" form of its young mistress? Florence was at that moment picturing to herself the subjugation of one high heart which had obstinately refused doing homage at her shrine-of one being in the wide world who had denied her determined that her third season should be distinguished by the conquest of the haughty. high, and handsome Earl of St. Clyde-not that she cared for him; oh, no! she was only cousin, Emma Neville, and herself on the sub-invulnerable, Florence. 'Nous verrons, nous verrons!' said the beauty, and taking her father's arm, she sprang lightly into the carriage. It was a brilliant ball! the rich and the no ble, the young and the beautiful-all were there; and in the centre of an admiring circle, dazzlingly conspicuous, stood Florence. She was preparing to waltz with a tall, dark, unbending looking personage, who was apparently quite indifferent whether he supported her light figure or that of any one else. This was Lord St. Clyde. Florence, on the contrary was all sparkling gaiety. She was dancing with him for the third time. Another moment and they were flying round the circle with rapid grace.

With experienced policy, however, she only leaned gracefully back, and gently fauned herself Lord St. Clyde stood by her side. He was any thing but a ball room man, for though his figure was faultless, and his dancing just enough to shew it off, he had none of that charming fluency of conversation which a dancing partner should have; he could not pay a compliment if he did not feel it-he would not if he thought it was expected; therefore had be been Mr. St. Clyde, jr., he would have been a great bore in society; as it was be was a de-

with her brightest smile. 'I am too selfish, my Lord : that galloppe is

The next moment the dancers were thrown into confusion. there was a rush toward the windows, and Lord St. Clyde was seen darting through the crowd toward the conservatory with a fainting figure in his arms-it was Florence Neville. The cousin bent affectionately over the insensible girl, and the Earl knelt by her with a glass of water.

'It was my fault!' exclaimed St. Clyde, in an agitated voice, 'I made her dance-good God! how lovely she looks; she does not revive-what shall we do?" 'Has no one salte?' cried Emma: call my uncle, I think we had bester go home-ob, who has any salts?" The Earl was already gone for them. With a stifled laugh Florence opened her wide beau-

Lord St. Clyde's eyes were fixed on her face, and the next moment she found herself walking with him whilst Mr. Neville was speaking to the hostess, whose gaunt daughter was looking very spiteful .-Florence played her part to admiration. Lord St. Clyde was in her power, for she had engaged him in an animated flirtation. They were standing on the brink of a beautifut fountain, when the Earl exclaimed, 'Do you know the lauguage of flowers, Miss Neville?"

'No,' said Florence, 'but it must be very pretty; do you know it, my Lord?'

'Yes, by heart.' 'Then tell me what these flowers mean?' Things went on exceedingly well.
