THOMAS OSBORNE & SON.

From the Morning Post, of August 27.

Monday Evening.—The corn market, as had been foreseen, was greatly depressed to-day; the new English wheats brought forward sell... at a heavy reduction on the price quoted last day week. The corn jobbers are always ... to resist a coming decline with an obstinacy common to monopolists, but the appearance of things to-day furnished the surest evidence of the difficulty in which they have placed themselves by a too ready belief in the insufficiency of the home supply. The arrival at market of cargoes of new wheat, and the uninterrupted continuance of fine weather, must put ... to all apprehensions for the present season.

The British Queen.—This vessel, which, as our ... mariners know, has been purchased by the Belgian ... government, is so nearly ready for sea that she will, as expected, sail for Antwerp to-morrow. She is ... to ply between Antwerp and New-York, calling off Cowes or Southampton, going and returning. She is under the command of Mr. Keane, who has received a commission in the Belgian service.—[Liverpool Albion of Aug. 30.

FROM THE CONTINENT.

Nothing of importance or of great interest appears to have occurred out of England. In France the ... of the census was going on quietly enough.—... the usual custom-house on between France and ... Belgium is, it is said, being abandoned by the ... French government. The removal of the sick in the French hospital at Mahon was in progress, the station being about to be given up to the Spanish Government.

Accounts have been received from Portugal that ... more conspiracy against the liberal institutions of that Kingdom and of Spain was in progress ... that it was even said that communications had ... made on the subject by the Government of ... to that of Spain. It is further said that a ... feeling is growing up between the two Governments, which may lead to an early explosion.

The reports of an anticipated revolution in the Northern Spanish provinces, or of an attempt at one, vague enough indeed, which we received by the last arrival, appear to have been altogether unfounded. The capital and the whole kingdom were quite tranquil.

The Duke of Wellington's Umbrella.—A fancy fair for charitable purposes was held last week at Cross-deep, between Twickenham and Teddington, by some of the ladies resident in that neighbourhood. The Duke of Wellington having been present, had gone away, leaving his umbrella behind him, whereupon Lady P—— immediately said, "Who will give 20 guineas for the Duke's umbrella?" In one moment a purchaser was found, and on his Grace's return the fact was communicated to him, when he good naturedly remarked, "I'll soon supply you with umbrellas if you sell them so much to the advantage of the charity."—[Standard.

Female Duellists.—The morning before last, at an early hour, a Garde Champetre, on duty in the environs of Montmartre, heard two pistol shots, and running to the spot whence the sound proceeded, to his astonishment saw two young and pretty women reloading their pistols, which they had just discharged in a duel. The man interposed to put an end to the combat, and, under pretext of escorting the fair duellists through the barrier, accompanied them hither, and immediately gave them in charge. They passed several hours in the guard-house before they were released.—Galignani.

THE NATIONAL DEBT.—The returns lately published by order of the House of Commons relative to the public debt of Great Britain, state that the unredeemed capital of the public funded debt, on the 5th of January, 1838, was £770,476,892; in 1831, £757,486,930; and in 1811, £766,371,725, that the amount of Exchequer bills outstanding in the same years was respectively £27,546,850, £27,271,953, and £22,271,000, the second amount including the issue under the act of 11th George IV. cap. 26, to pay off the proprietors of the 4 per cent Annuities, amounting on the 5th of January, 1831, to £1,662,900; that the amount of terminable annuities, whether for lives or years was for three years respectively £2,610,751, £3,237,375, and £1,114,021; that the sums required to defray the charge of the interest and management of the permanent public debt during these periods were £26,779,115, £24,367,379, and £24,442,203; and that the sums paid or required to defray the interest on Exchequer bills for those years were £872,256, £875,000, and £918,000. The amount of all payments made out of the consolidated fund of Great Britain and Ireland, other than on account of interest and management of the national debt and the civil list, was for the year ending the 5th Jan. 1839, £18,457,172; for the year ending the same month in 1831, £31,962,918; and for the year ending 1811, £32,952,791.

THREE THURSDAYS IN ONE WEEK.

[From an old MS in French.]

Of all the paradoxes there is none more surprising or more calculated to disturb the mind than that which asserts the possibility of having three Thursdays in one week. It is, notwithstanding, possible, and during the last century it was demonstrated more than once. Circumnavigators in their voyages round the world have discovered the fact. The ancients never entertained an idea of the possibility of such a thing. It was a matter of astonishment to Seamen sailing eastward round the world, to find on their return to the place from whence they commenced their voyage that they had gained a day. It was Thursday with them, and Wednesday at the place of their arrival.

On the contrary, those who sailed Westward round the world, counted on their return, one day less to have passed than those did who had continued all the while at the place from whence the ship set out, so that it was Wednesday with the circumnavigators, and Thursday at the place of their arrival. As the pilots and others kept journals, and paid strict attention to every occurrence during the voyage, they were in the first instance at a loss to account for the difference they found between the journals of those who sailed East, and those who had taken a Westerly course. They accused each other of negligence and the disputes led to a strong contest. Several able mathematicians at last discovered the cause. They found that the difference in time was occasioned by the laws of nature, and not the fault of navigators.

The reason will be easily seen. Every 15 degrees upon the quarter is equal to one hour of time, and the vessel sailing Easterly always approaches sunrise. When they have sailed 15 degrees East from the meridian of London, it will be noon one hour sooner than those of London. When they reach the meridian of Calais, 30 degrees East of London, they will have seen two hours sooner than those at London, so that when they have gone 360 degrees and it will be noon, according to their reckoning, 24 hours or a whole day sooner than those who stay at London; or, Thursday to them when it is but Wednesday noon in England.

On the other hand, if a ship set out for London and like travel, when they come to the meridian of the County Limits, 15 degrees west of London, their noon will be an hour later than at London.—At 30 degrees west, it will be noon two hours later than at London, and when they get round to London, again through the 24 meridians, their natural day will be 24 hours later than at London, or Wednesday noon with them, whilst it is Thursday noon at London. In this all are not necessary a ship should circumnavigate the globe upon the expectation of its entering the Thursday in a week. Two ships sailing from the Antipodes to London, one East and the other West, would have the same result. For instance, suppose a ship sails from the Antipodes to Rochelle. Both ships sail on Wednesday at Rochelle, but the circumnavigator has sailed all the time with the sun, and has gained a day. Both ships sail on Thursday at Rochelle. The circumnavigator has sailed two Thursdays in a week. To find a third in this same week, we must suppose another navigator, to sail from East to West. When he has reached 180 degrees west he will find himself opposite to that of Rochelle, and it will be Tuesday morning. Sailing from there, they will have noon at Rochelle. Sailing the third time every day, (as the third is every day to those who sailed East and who sailed West) they will arrive at Rochelle, they would find an hour's difference of twenty-four hours between their reckoning. The Wednesday at Rochelle is Thursday to those who went to the East, because they gained a day. Secondly, the Friday of Rochelle is Thursday to those who sailed West, because they have lost a day. The Thursday at Rochelle is the third. Thus, according to time, there are three Thursdays in one week.

The following amusing description of the row that took place in the United States' House of Representatives, on the 8th instant, is from an Extra of the New York Herald of Sunday last:—

Mr. Wise advanced across the Hall towards the seat of Mr. Stanley, and leaned down as if to speak to him. On the instant Mr. Stanley arose, and he and Mr. Wise were thus brought face to face. Mr. Wise then shook his finger violently at Mr. Stanley, which Mr. Stanley as promptly and as expeditiously returned. After a few words in an under tone, they again shook their fingers, one at the other. Mr. Wise advanced a few feet towards the door, and in turning his back to Mr. Stanley, beckoned him to follow. Mr. Stanley immediately threw aside his head, and flung out his arms with a sudden movement, as if disdaining to accept of Mr. Wise's invitation. Mr. Wise then turned round and proceeded in the direction of his seat; but as soon as he reached Mr. Stanley, he again spoke to him, and the shaking of their fingers, one at the other, was again renewed. All this occupied a very brief period: so short in fact that it was scarcely perceived before the denouement. It was understood that warm words ensued between the two honorable gentlemen, which were only heard by a few gentlemen who were seated near them. Mr. Morgan of New York, and Mr. Dawson of Georgia, were amongst those gentlemen, and not anticipating any rencontre, they playfully remarked, "boys, keep cool." Mr. Wise, however, failing in his attempt to induce Mr. Stanley to accompany him out of the House, said, the gentleman from North Carolina was contemptible and beneath his notice. Mr. Stanley retorted, that the gentlemen from Virginia was "a liar," and then Mr. Wise struck at Mr. Stanley, but the latter gentleman parried the blow, receiving but a slight slap on the face; but he returned to the attack with vigor and skill, and "slap, slap, slap," resounded through the House, as the honorable pugilists "pummelled" each other in the most approved manner of the Fives Court.

In an instant the whole House presented the appearance of a street fight—most of the members rushed to the scene of action, and crowded round the combatants, some jumping from desk to desk, over the heads of other members, and others elbowing their way in the crowd, uttering exclamations of all descriptions, the prevailing cries being "order," "order," "order," "go it Stanley," "give it him Stanley," and Stanley, in dutiful obedience, did "go it" merrily. He had seized the collar of the gentleman from Virginia with his sinister hand, and with his dexter hand dexterously belabored his antagonist, who was thrown with his back against a desk. In the general melee, Mr. Arnold, of Tennessee, the denouncer of the Presidential "wretch" who vetoed the Bank bill, and Colonel Butler of Kentucky came in collision, and the strife was fierce and vigorous. Ultimately Col. Butler seized Mr. Arnold by the throat, threw him with the small of his back on the arm of a chair, and choked him until his face became as purple as Mr. Botts' during the reading of the veto message, and his tongue protruded down to his cravat. The Speaker screamed out "order," the Clerk of the house seized the Sergeant-at-Arms' mace and ran about the house with the ponderous instrument on his shoulder, like a Roman battle axe, screaming "order, gentlemen, order." Mr. Brown, of Tennessee, stood on the top of one of the desks, and with uplifted hands cried, "for the honor of your country and for the love of God, come to order"—"order be damned" was responded by some one, "Go into them—let 'em have it." "Send for the Sergeant at Arms," "order," "order," screamed a hundred voices. The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared, and cried "order," as lustily as the busiest. "Go among them, and we will support you to the sacrifice of our heart's blood," exclaimed one gentleman to the Sergeant at Arms; but the gentleman's courage appeared to have evaporated long since, and his heart's blood with it.

Mr. Dixon H. Lewis elbowed his way to the scene of action, to separate the combatants. But still the strife was fierce and desperate. Mr. Gilmer and Mr. Proffit cleared the desks at a hop skip, and a jump, into the midst of the affray: neighbor clutched neighbor, and they struggled, pushed, roared, and cursed each other in perfect desperation. The beating of the Speaker's hammer, and his demands to come to order, were disregarded, and the suppressed screams of terror of the ladies in the gallery, whose statue-like attitudes and livid features betrayed the alarm which the scene occasioned, were unheard. "Not a precious row," coolly remarked a recent importation from the vicinity of Bow Bells, as he passed complacently from the gallery to the struggle below; and a precious row it was, so long as it lasted. Ultimately Colonel Butler relaxed his gripe of Mr. Arnold's throat, Mr. Dawson threw Mr. Stanley across his knees with the aid of Mr. Morgan, Mr. Dixon H. Lewis, with ponderous arm cleared the desks and kept back Mr. Wise, "Gentlemen that wish to restore order, take your seats" cried General Ward, with the blandest accents of a gentleman, but the courageous determination of a gallant soldier, and the general voice was like oil on the troubled waters. His advice was taken, and to the General the credit is due of destroying a most interesting tableau. The members jumped down from the desks—those who had been in the thickest of the fight adjusted their dishevelled apparel—Mr. Wise, (who to use the language of a gentleman who witnessed the scene from the gallery, presented a most horrible, ghostly and death-like expression of countenance,) returned to his seat—the crisis had passed.

AWFUL MURDER OF A YOUNG WOMAN.

Yesterday forenoon a most horrible murder was committed in the Cambridge alms house, (Cambridgeport,) on the person of a young woman named Sarah Stevens, by a man named William H Britton. He plunged a large carving knife into the right fore-shoulder and breast, four inches in depth and hung out under her left shoulder-blade.

Britton, as a pauper, became an inmate of the Alms House in September, 1840, being aged and somewhat infirm. He possessed some literary acquirements, and was employed as a teacher to the children in the establishment. In June last, Miss Stevenson, then labouring under a painful disease, became an inmate of the house, and after she had improved in health in some degree, she undertook to learn to write under the instructions of Britton. In consequence of the family intercourse naturally arising from this, Britton conceived a violent passion for her, and proposed to marry her.

She declined on account of his age and inability to support a family. He pressed his suit and she had the subject before Mr. Pendexter, the overseer of the poor, who at once advised her to accept Britton's proposals, as he could and told her, whenever she entered her room, to leave it, and come to this private apartment. She did request this advice for some weeks. One day in the morning he entered her room, and she left it, and went into one occupied by two aged women.

He did not remain long before she followed, and he began to speak to her companions from a New Testament, which Mrs. Valentine had given to her. While thus engaged Britton entered, and said to her in other words, "Is this your room?" Before they returned any reply to his answer he drew the carving knife from under his shirt bosom, and pounced to the deceased, seized her round the body and flung her on a bed. One of the women caught hold of him, but he turned upon her with the uplifted knife, like a tiger, and she quailed before him. The other woman then grasped him round the body, but was driven off in the same manner as the first one. The deceased in the mean time was exclaiming—"Do not kill me! Don't kill me!" He first made a violent pass at her throat, but she partly stopped the knife with her right hand in which it cut a horrible gash, four inches long, but only barely scratched her throat. He then struck at her above stated, and drove the knife clear through the body.

In the spasmodic agony of the moment, she sprang from the bed, advanced toward the door, and fell dead on the threshold. Mrs. Valentine had rushed up to her assistance, and as she fell, bent over to raise her, but Britton also struck at her, and forced her to keep back. "Murder" was cried in every quarter of the building, and reached the ear of James Forister, teamster in the yard, who ran up stairs, and seized Britton while in the act of bending over his murdered victim. When seized, he dropped the hand like a child.

A coroner's inquest was immediately held, and a verdict of wilful murder returned. After a sort examination before Justice Chamberlain, at which he confessed the deed, he was conveyed to the jail at East Cambridge.

The deceased was a native of Ireland, about twenty years of age—quite handsome, and very intelligent, and exceedingly desirous of mental improvement. She was much respected on account of her excellent conduct, notwithstanding her poverty.

Britton is 57 years of age, a native of Halifax, N. S., out of which port he sailed many years as master of a vessel. During the last war he was taken by an American privateer, commanded by Capt. Crowningshield, and carried in a prisoner to Salem. He was a widower, his wife having been dead nine years, and during this period he has also buried two women-grown daughters.

Desperate Affair.—On Thursday last, while Mr. Seymour Patterson was passing along the street in Wallingford, he was hailed by two young men named Delos Allen and Henry Rice, each of whom presented a musket and ordered him to stop, or be shot down in the street. Mr. P. failing instantly to obey this unceremonious summons, was immediately fired at by each of the young men in quick succession, part of the charge from one of the guns taking effect and wounding him in the face, though not dangerously. Allen and Rice were immediately secured, and on Saturday morning, after a hearing before Mr. Justice Pomeroy, were ordered to find bonds for their appearance at the next county court, for want of which they were committed to the jail of this city. Rum was undoubtedly the exciting cause of this desperate offence, as it appeared that the young men had been drinking freely at the time of the attack.—[New Haven Herald.

The City.—The Mob.—The committee of public safety, appointed on Sunday last, have announced that "the peace of the City is entirely restored." They acknowledge the prompt aid received from the Governor, the military, the citizens, and the public officers—deplore the exaggerated rumours afloat, and particularly in reference to personal violence upon colored females, which they say upon enquiry, they "are inclined to think are in a great measure without foundation." They have disposed of "the colored persons who have been placed in the county jail," as follows:—38 discharged on certificate of nativity—110 discharged upon filing bond under the act of 1837, or placed in the hands of respectable securities for that purpose—28 discharged as non-resident under pledge to return to their homes—26 were discharged by an Associate Judge of the Court of Common Pleas—about 73 remain for further disposition.—Besides these a number of children were discharged.

The causes which have produced the disgraceful mob which has overrun our city are not yet fully ascertained, and perhaps may never be; but we incline to delay yet a little while, for a more certain detail of facts, from which to elicit the causes of the outbreak. A few days may bring to light many facts connected with the late excesses, not known or credited.

Attempt to Burn Church.—Yesterday morning, about 3 o'clock, an attempt was made to burn the Reform Presbyterian Church, on George, between Race and Elm streets. The incendiaries had taken a quantity of shavings into the church, which they entered from a back window, placed them in a small cupboard under the pulpit, and communicated fire thereto. The people occupying an adjoining house discovered the flames in time to save the church and probably much other property in the neighborhood. We understand that on Monday night last the windows of the church were broken, no doubt with a view to further violence. Through the windows thus broken the incendiaries entered.

Riot.—A serious affray took place in this city on Tuesday evening, in the early part of the night, in consequence of an assault committed on a woman in a disorderly house on Bank alley, between Main and Walnut streets. Some of the watchmen immediately went to preserve the peace, and when in the house they were attacked, and three of them, Captain Dowlin, Lieutenant J. B. Dowlin and Robt. Fatal Accident.—Yesterday afternoon, a little boy, about 4 years old, son of Mr. Thomas Hall, of Cambridge, was run over by a horse and chaise, and killed. The child was playing in the street, and the driver of the horse was unable to stop him in time to prevent the accident.
