is pleasantly varied, and will, we think, be much liked. It opens with the romance of "Richard Savage," which maintains its interest unimpaired. One scene, in particular, between the old steward, Ludlow, and the hero, when the former details to the latter the story of his wife's degradation, exisbits considerable vigour both of sentiment and expression. "Donnybrook Fair," as may be enticipated from its title, abounds in broad, humourous descriptive touches. The "Heart and the Key" is an account of the perpetration, and discovery, under very unusual circumstances, of a murder. The narrative is told with earnestness and feeling. The "Moated Grange" is an anecdote of the stirring times of the Cavallers and Roundheads, and regards
