

"She was kindness itself to every human creature; and with respect to them, it was astonishing to see so young a girl fulfil all the duties of a tender parent. But whatever a wise world may say of her, I can assure you that she was the wife of her angelic mother; her uncommon beauty was her least merit; her abilities, her temper, her heart were all of the highest order of excellence, and I—Oh! Mrs. Lindsay, I was deeply honoured with a boy's first immovable profusion of love and admiration! Well, over days never to be forgotten, never to return on earth, I will pass on in silence."

"One morning I heard my uncle's voice load in the drawing room, and some one sobbing and shrieking. I rushed in, and beheld him chattering his Threodesis with his heavy hand; yet actually striking the helpless infant! My blood boiled—but that blood was very hot in me. I will not recapitulate what ensued; suffice, my sisters and myself were deeply shocked, and we all deplored it. I never saw his face again. Lord Morpeth, who was a relative of our mother's, at once undertook the charge of my sisters. I was now more than eighteen, and had entered on the study of law, intending to become a barrister. The income I virtually commanded was more than sufficient for my moderate expenses, and for the education of my sisters. Mrs. Lindsay had been a widow, and seemed to look to England, which had been her home growing on Lord Glenayre; he had soon broken off all connection with almost his whole family, and very soon went abroad, carrying poor Matilda with him, whence he never returned. As long as he remained, in either Italy or France; but a few years afterward he was deprived of that only boy; and he afterwards wandered through various parts of the world, no one knew where. He had long done with correspondence, except on business, and my poor cousin's death was not known in England for many months after it took place."

"As long as I was merely a student of the Temple, with a few hundred a year, and two unprovided sisters, the world totally neglected me; but I could express to you my disgust at the immediate, the shameless alteration that took place in every one's estimation, when he became a little lord (as it was supposed). His name, 'Glenayre' No., was not adequate to the title. My cousin was of age, and, to my surprise, bequeathed to me an estate which had been left him by a relative. I now just learnt that, from legal difficulties, I need not detail to you, it was more probable that, although the title must descend to the whole of the family, nothing would fall to Matilda; he will provide for her, and she is relatively financially secure; his bequest should revert to his sister.

"As I had now a competence, and was no longer a slave to my profession, I abandoned it, and mingled with a world which, from my very soul, I despised.

Soon after, my uncle sought a reconciliation with me, and I should willingly, and without a single hope—that the flags of your kindness I can assure you—soothed your fears—(cheers) soothed your fears, brother, whether they met upon the boughs or in the bower, may meet in the same spirit of amity and good will—which animates the hearts of those around this festive board. (Cheers.) In that spirit, when we have gathered round the fireside, the relations of a brother were not always a favorable omen to communion. My direct ancestor, by the name of Peter Will, though a borderer, did not deserve a very peaceful reputation—but his father time was a fierce warrior, and his son a fierce knight.

"Sweet Teresa on the pedestal!" "He,

"TIME AND OPPORTUNITY FOR THE PEACE MAKERS."

"The intense anxiety with which the British public viewed the issue of Lord M's trial and Gordon's arrest has been increased by a state of feeling most favorable to the preservation of peace. But it would be a great mistake to imagine that peace has been secured by the release of these individuals."

"And," continued his lordship, "as it is with the English, so it is with us; the Atlantic, the Solent of the border, is rusty, and from the watchtower look forth to see the signs of peace and prosperity. Civilization and modern counsels have proved that the progress and the strides of human knowledge have been made by the wisdom of our fathers; but the disturbed state of frontier relations have passed over without producing war, but the disturbed state of frontier relations exists as before; all that the friends of peace have gained is time and opportunity. During the reigns of sentiment, at both ends occasioned by the release of these men, there will be time for negotiation; and that reign of sentiment offers the opportunity of arranging in a friendly spirit. If both parties now act in the work in earnest, we may finally put away the occasions of difference between them."

"Two of these are proper subjects of regulation.

"The first is the Boundary question; involving both the national polity and certain private interests which have grown up during the strife; it seems impossible to dispense of the point of honor, except by the arbitration of a third power. The private interests consist of property in the forests and successions of our common enemies. You have supplied distinguished men for the public service—in India and many other countries are now employed and honorably employed in Canada. Your troops in their ranks have already kept pace with your triumphs in arms. Your Campbells and Burns, and Scotts. These lands you will continue to wear in peace and in war, who else can find a field for your enterprise? The parish schools that flourished in the old country have been established in Canada, and successions of our common enemies. This question was clearly regulated by the British Government, and so the value has greatly increased of late years.
