the defence, the eventual hopelessness to resist the overwhelming might of the enemy, he assembled his men around him, and declared to them his fixed determination to resist still to the last man; and as all anticipated in the enthusiasm, he selected two from their number, provided them with hand-grenades, and commanded them. as soon after their retreat to their last hastilyconstructed intrenchment as they should find the number of the defenders reduced to twelve, to light them and fling them into the nowder-room. The assault was terrific-more terrific the resistance. As, however, the multitude l of the enemy had now prevailed over the despairing bravery of the handful of combatants who yet opposed them, and that three-fourths of the garrison had fallen, the captain ordered three of his six guns to be spiked, and retired with the remaining three to his last entrenchment. At length, after the most lion-hearted resistance, behind a triple wall of the bodies of his gallant comrades, he made the signal agreed upon to his two grenadiers. In the same moment that the Circassians rushed on in masses to the storm, and believed themselves in full possession of the redoubt, the explosion followed, hurling into the air every man who had penetrated the intrenchment, with a violence that carried the massive beams of the works to a distance of six hundred yards. The rocks around trembled with the shock, and the thundering echo carried to the furthest mountains the report of the heroic deed. Heavy was the loss of the Circassians. A Cossack, stationed as vidette on one of the distant towers, which the Circassians would not take the trouble to assail, witness of this fearful scene, was taken prisoner shortly after, but escaping with great dexterity, furnished the particulars of the foregoing relation.

The bridegroom places it is his bo-som, but in such a way that a large portion of it may hang out ostentationaly, which he continues to do on every festive occasion, in token of victory. Many other visits follow, all of the same stiff and ceremonious nature, and all marked by various girds until the wedding-day. After the ceremony, the bride and bridegroom each return to their own houses, to entertain separate parties of guests. After this has continued for some time, the bridegroom sends to the bride's house, inviting her and has gueste to come and join him. She at fire refuses to come. He sends a second time, and she promises to come, but does not do so. It is not till the third time that she leaves her paternal home, and enters that of her husband. Here a great feast is held of wine, white bread, meat, fish, brawn, porridge, beleech (a kind of cake made of twenty thin flakes of dough, with elices of of apple between,) and other favourite Hungarian dishes. Etiquette, however, forbids the sad and timid bride to taste any of these dishes; if she did so, the whole Puste would be scandalized. The wedding feast ended, one of the most important of the marriage teremonies, the "binding of the head," follows. The bride's hair, which until now she has worn nose and hanging down, is gathered up into a very elaborate knot, and the plaint are smoothly laid round her head; after which, the head-cloth, worn by matrons, a carefully folded upon it. This done, friends of the bride go round, taking a wash-hand basin, in which each washes his hands, or affects to do so, and at the same time drops a small piece of money. into the water.
