FAREWELL OF SUMMER

FAREWELL! for I may not rest longer here:-I have heard the far voice of the waning Year! As it came through the valley it whispered of death And the forest leaves pul'd at the sound of its breath: The white-bosomed fily sank down on the stream. And the violet shaded her blue-eye's beam.

The resper hath gathered the golden corn ; The hunter is out with his baldrick and horn ; The wild bee rooms yet, and the ruddock that-

The pullid babe's shroud dress of withering leaves But the starry winged fly, and the purple-hued

They are gone-they are gone from my faded

But mourn not for me : I will shelter me far, Where the winter-wind blights not my wreathed

Again in the beds of your streams will unfold My noon-day mantle of green and of gold ;-And full Day's bright fall in my rosy nest, Till his young eye close and he sinks to rest.

I go-and the thought both awakened a tear,-But hark ! the far voice of the waning Year Grows deeper and wilder, more hollow and stern, As it mormurs, by fits, in the nere red fern'; There is fear in the sound, there is wee in the knell; vested in him. Its echoings whisper of death-Farewell !
