From IRELAND, the accounts are unfortupately no better. The mortality from sickness produced by famine is awful. Still relief had afforded a partial alleviation. We extractithe following from one of our exchanges The accounts from Ireland are very awful.

Doblin correspondent of the Morning Chronicle says-"There have been farther tumultuary proceeding and processions of the peasantry in various parts of the country, and the military and police have been in requisition to Rech this spirit of insubordination in check .-The reports of the progress of pestilence are quite disheartening, and, notwithstanding all relief in food and money, great destitution still prevails, and the markets are advancing. All accounts concur in showing that the mortality is still very considerable. According to some calculations, the population has already been diminished to the extent of nearly one million, from deaths and emigration. But I should suppose that this estimate, for which there can be nothing like certain or accurate data, is greatly exaggerated."

The local taxes, which must provide for this enormous amount of wretchedness, have been swelled to an extent that shocks the nerves or that alarmingly sensitive biped, "the oldest inhabitant." The pressure thus created ought not to be a local, but a National burthen; yet the Executive, who think that the Liverpool public ought to pay in kind for the advantages of their position, decline to interfere. The people have at length stirred to prevent the inevitable accurping that must accrue from this immigration of the poor, the diseased, and the helpless from the "far West." They have insisted that the wretched Irish paupers, in a state of disease, shall not be permitted to land; the steamers bringing such are treated as vessels arriving from foreign ports without a clean bill of health, and are subject to the quarantine laws. This has stopped the nuisance for a time-whether permanently, reenains to be seen. In the meantime, fever rages violently.
