FRIDAY EVENING, DEC. 6. The Neap Reef. BY MRS. PARR, AUTHOR OF "DOROTHY FOX."

Many years ago Redneap was a humble little village, unknown to tourists and pleasure-seekers, innocent of hotels and bathing establishments, not dreamed of by ledginghouse-keepers or enterprising companies, and inhabited chiefly by seamen who trades between it and the French coast. Of the mariners who knew and dreaded the hidder

the vessel off the fatal shoal. The Redneap men were known to be good sailers; and their houses, substantially and 1 comfortably furnished, bore testimeny to the industry and prudence of the owners. The cottages were rather straggling and widely parted. The better sort were built of stone, with a little patch of ground in front walled off from the road, and planted -after the fashion most favoured in Red neap—with a long tamarisk tree, surround ed by large shells, yellow marigolds, and grassy tufts of sea-pinks.

High up the Luton road stood one of the neatest specimens of these somewhat ur picturesque dwellings. It belonged to the widow Lee, whose tall, upright figure is just discernible, as this evening she sits half turned from the window, at the little GROCERY,
