SATURDAY EVENING, DEC. 21.

The Neap Reef-A Christmas BY MRS. PARR, AUTHOR OF "DOROTHY FOX." And how had it fared with Marget during months of Philip's absence? Alas! but sadly. The winter, which was always a time of hardship and privation, had set in unusually early; her grandfather had beem entirely laid up with a severe attack of his eld enemy rheumatism; and the responsibility of gaining what little they could, at a time when work was scarce and provision dear, fell wholly to Margot's share. Poor child! the neighbours who saw her with her load in the village, and Mrs. Lee, who sneeringly said she looked like a packman little knew that the burthen she carried was light compared with her heavy heartheavy and serrewful, as she remembered hew small the sum for which she had been able to sell her nets and one or two boxes, and hew little it would do towards giving them even necessaries in the home from which she had started that morning all but She wanted to take the poor of man a little tobacce; he hadn't a pipe for days, and, as he often said, he could stand anything so long as he'd got his baccy. Net a murmur had escaped his lips, but Margot knew well the cause of his restlessmess, the reason why he couldn't sleep at night Just before she reached the small shop, she turned up a small lane to count her mo once more, and if she only could get half an ounce even that would be such a treat to him; and resting herself by leaning against the low stone wall, she stood looking at her pared to repair Grand, Cottage and Square "Margot," said a voice at her side of the started to find Dick Barry there. "Were she started to find Dick Barry there. "Were you counting your money," he asked laughingly, "to see how much you've got for Mother William was a see how much you've got for Mother White's sugar-sticks."

Sugar-sticks! when she was so hungerine after a piece of bread that she could scarcethink of aught else-and the tears which lay close to her eyes while she but tled to keep them down, brimam and rolled in great dreps down her chee "What's the matter then, eh, Margot ?" and the young fellow's tendernes spoke ; "Oh, nothing!" she answered, brushing her hand across her eyes; "but winter is
