titude of Reformer's transgressions, and rights. still later we have the legislation deemed necessary to set at rest the much vexed question of Queen's Counse appointments. The important subjects to be brought before Parliament as intimated in the Governors speech are kept in the back-ground, until the venerated names of the leaders of Reform have been full veneered. Whether the measures in question will have the desired effect is entirely another matter. After the atrocious bungling of the ex-President of the Council in the first essay at the appointment of Queen's Counsel, it is not unreasonable to claim a suspension of judgment regarding the constitutionality and effectiveness of the present attempt to set matters right.
