SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 1.

Miles: A Fantasy.

Miles gazed at Ida with a melancholy smile. "My darling child"—(it seemed as if in this supreme moment he felt himself as removed from her in years as he was in thought, though in fact he was little her senior)—"my child, we must do right."

"Right! It would be a cruel wrong to me! I am not a puppet or a child, as you seem to think; and I will not submit to be made miserable for life, Mr Kavanah." This was a perplexing state of things, Here was Miles about to sacrifice what he held dearest for honour ;and, le, the victim obstinately refused to be immolated! True, in her case such immolation might mean salvation, but she was none the less res-

"I tell you what they would do if we went back. They would forgive me on condition that I never spoke to you again; and they would be so pleased with you they would probably give you a thousand pounds, and let pou go where you pleased—except with-in the precincts of Brabazon Castle."

The hot blood flushed into Miles's face. My poor Miles, I am not a poet or a genius, like you. I am only a very ordinary person, like papa and mamma; and I know
