SEE FIRST PAGE. ARCHBISHOP MANNING AND THE CHILDREN.

Archbishop Manning has issued another pastoral on the subject of Catholic children in workhouse schools. We can sympathise with his anxiety that the children of the devotees of his own Church should not be trained against their will in another faith; but the protests which that anxiety inspires gain no strength from the exaggerations into which he allows himself to be betrayed. Protestantism may be an abominable thing in hi sight; and we can have no objection to his saying so; but to try to get up a cry of deliberate persecution of Catholic children against guardians of the poor, is not less ridiculous than undignified and uncalled for. The governing authorities in England have always shown a sensitive regard for-we will not say the religious prejudices, but—the religious rights of those who, whether by poverty or crime, have been cast upon their hands but in carrying out an intention, the liberality of which Rome never evinced any desire to emulate, practical conveniences can not be utlerly ignored, nor can practical difficulties be instantaneously overcome. When Archbishop Manning says that the cost of educating pauper children in Catholic schools is no greater than that of keeping them in the workhouse, he puts forth a definite contradiction to statement made on the authority of realised statistic. on the other side; and when he says that there is no motive for not conceding his demands except religious bigotry, and the will to oppress the weak, he casts most un just and ungrateful reflections on a countr the most liberal and tolerant in the worl

DEATH OF WILLIAM JERDAN.-Forty years ago there were few names better known in London society and in the world of letters than that of William Jerdan. Surviving almost all his literary contemporaries, he died on the 11th inst., at Bushey-heath, in his 87th year. A native of Kelso, and educated at Edinburgh for the Scottish law, he came to London to push his way in literature. With most of the notable personages of the last 50 years he had personal acquaintance, and with some of the men of highest mark in literature and relief and convincing evidence of its restorative politics he hasbeen on terms of intimacy. t was Mr Jerdan who, in the lobby of the old House of Commons, seized Bellingham, the assassin of Mr Perceval. At that time one of the reporters for the Press, his connexion with periodical literature continued for half a century. Late in life he received a pension of £100 a year for his long services to literature.

Agrarian outrages are still on the increase in Ireland, and the spirit of lawlessness is exhibiting itself in a country which it was heretofore unknown. In no part of Ireland did better or more friendly relations exist between the landlords and tenantry than in the county of Galway. There never has been, as well as we can remember, a solitary instance of the assassination of a landed proprietor. Many new men became possessors of property in it by purchases made in the Encumbered Estates Court, and although as a class they are, not only there, but in every other part of Ireland, considered as less indulgent landlords than their predecessors, and have not only in many instances raised the former reats, but dispossessed many of the tenantry, we cannot call to mind any instances of revenge. It is, then, with sincere regret unsuccessful, attempt has been made to for tle Lambert, the representative of one the oldest and most respectable Connaught families. Fortunately, hopes are entertained of his ultimate recovery.

The result of recent experiments at Dartmoor has been in favour of the segment rather than the Shrapnell shell. The committee which superintended the experiments has come to the conclusion that the ninepounder rifled gun which at present forms the armament of the batteries of horse artillery is a much inferior gun to the twelve pounder, and will probably recommend the adoption of the latter throughout the field artillery. The committee appointed to de cide upon the equipment of field artillery India have issued a preliminary report, which they recommend the adoption of bronze twelve pounder rifle muzzle loading
