The municipal accounts do not furnish room for any such stealings, and they have been examined for several years back. The Gazette observes:--

"We are inclined to believe that the loss to the public coffers will not be large. But the loss of credit to the civil service by the success of this manipulation of the public moneys and accounts and to the administration of justice, by this arrangement for bail and escape from justice, must be great. Nothing of the same kind was ever probed to the bottom. Neither Government nor Parliament can afford to allow further opportunity for such peculations."

In these views the Gazette is in unison with the general feeling, which demands the strictest inquiry and the application of a more efficient system of checking accounts.
