And, more likely than not, the solution of the colonial difficulty, one of the greatest in our man's-buff. Yet it is worth while to try to prevent so pitiful a consummation. One does not want the wide-flaming colonial empire to go out we permit the inevitable change in the composition of the empire to be effecte', not by deliberate policy, but by mere arathy, blindness, and lethargic drifting. George III had, at any rate. a policy of a tolerably plausible sort; be was ! actuated by patriotism, though if he had hated his country instead of loving it, and been a more keen-sighted man, he would have acted just as he did. At present, so far as one can see, the English nation is without a colonial policy, either of the plausible or any other sort.
