Gen. Ducrot has been publicly charged by Count Bismarck with having broken the parole which he gave, in common with pair to Pont-a-Mousson, and there constitute himself a prisoner of war. He did, he says, repair to Pont-a-Mousson, and did there surrender himself to the Prussian military authorities, and thus fully complied with the terms of his parole. Subsequently, however, he succeeded in effecting his escape, and, having effected it, has the same right again to take up arms that any other escaped prisoner would have. His statement is plain and straightforward, and is probably true.
