FRIDAY EVENING, MARCH 21.

The fellewing speeches on the metien for a select committee to inquire into the best route for mails and passengers between this country and Europe, introduced by the hon, member for Lennox in the Deminion Parliament on Wednesday, will be read

Mr Cartwright moved for a select comto inquire into the best and most direct route for the mails and passengers between this Dominion and Europe. In introducing his motion he said that the subject was one which was worth their trouble to investigate. He could scarcely expect that the Government of this country would be willing to saddle itself with any more serious undertakings in the shape of railways to be built at the country's expense, at least until they could see their way to the discharge of what they had already undertaken. Nevertheless he need not say that this Dominion ought to be vastly interested in the question to which he referred. He thought that the non. gentlemen who remembered the discussion of the Intercolonial Railway question would be aware that whatever the advantages of that road might be, if some other traffic than that afforded by the natural resources of the country through which it passed were not created for it, it was likely to be a burden upon the hands of the country for some time at least. He hoped to be able to establish the fact that were a case made out in favour of the scheme he would bring under the notice of the House, it would not merely diminish this burden, but would yield a small revenue. He did not think it necessary to say much with regard to the attention which the question deserved at the hands of the House. The route to which he would direct the attention of the House was that commonly known as the Newfoundland route, upon which a most complete and elaborate report had been made by Mr Sandford Fleming. He did not intend to go into the details of the scheme, but would TATE ALWAYS keep on hand ORGANS which would arise from its adoption. The and MELODEONS of the best Cana- House was aware that the city of St. John's, ENGLISH UPRIGHT PIANOS Newfoundland, was the most easterly point of the Continent, and the Island of Valentia, near Ireland, the most westerly point of the Continent of Europe, and the distance between these two points was little more than half that between New York and This alone was prima facie evidence for the advantages of the route so far as shortening the journey between this and the Mether Country was concerned, because in that was also involved the important principle of speed in the rate of transit. If the adoption of tween London and Canada from 250 to 300 hours down to 100, and the double journey between Montreal and London to a period of 12 or 13 days. Not only, however, would the nearest seaport to that city in Europe. this route were found possible and practicable, it would reduce the ocean voyage bethere be a saving in time, but there would be a vast additional comfort, which had a great influence, not merely upon the number but also upon the character of the people who use the route; and lastly there would be a very material advantage, in point of safety, by reducing to a minimum the danger to which vessels are exposed in the course of their journey across the Atlantic. As many as 13 or 14 steamships had, in the course of the last ten years, been lest between New York, and Cape Race, but it was to be remembered that the actual less was not allthat had to be considered. There were risks and hair-breadth escapes in great numbers, of which the country had heard nothing, but which had caused the journey between these points to be a source of anxiety, trouble, and expense to the proprietors of the vessels. As he understood the matters, all the vessels from New York for Europe found it necessary to make Cape Race before they stood out to sea. If he were correct in this the importance of the additional safety which would be afforded by the proposed rente. would be greatly magnified, because the neighbourhood of Cape Race was a most To arrive-1 CASE BLACK, COLOURED dangerous one. With respect to the correctness of his estimate of the possible time it would take to make the journey between the two points he had indicated, he said his calculations were based on the speed of one of Her Majesty's man-of-war ships, which inade an average of 14 knots an hour; and he was of opinion that if ships were built especially for the trade of the proposed route, carrying passengers alone, the rate of speed could be greatly accelerated. That such an arrangement would have the effect specified • had been well illustrated by Mr Fleming, and proof was found of the correctness of the principle in the difference between the rates of speed of purely passenger and mixed trains. He would venture to assert to the Store. House that the route was practicable. There was one missing link, however, in this route, namely, the railway that would require to be constructed across the Island of Newfoundland, which would be from 200 to 250 miles in length. The expense would probably be of rather serious importance, but he did not propose that the country should pay it directly. What he proposed to do was to give the mail contracts now made with the Cunard, Allan, and other companies to the line of steamers that would be placed upon this new route, and to expend the subsidies at present granted to the steamship companies in the construction and maintenance of the railway across Newfoundland, until such time as it would pay off from its own profits all such expenses. That he was too sanguine in expecting that it would do so in a very short time he was not at all disposed to think. The passenger traffic between Europe and America was steadily on the increase-no less, he was safe to say, than 100,000 first-class passengers yearly going backwards and forwards between the two continents-and with increased facilities the number would not fail to increase in a vast ratio. A great number of emigrants yearly crossed the Atlantic to the American continet, sometimes as many as 500,000 to 600,000; and although many of them would, doubless, not come by the proposed line, yet they would form no inconsiderable proportion of the traffic. The united population of Canada and the United States was at present between seventy and eighty millions, and in the course of a few years could not, fail to reach ninety or one hundred millions. A vast proportion of that increase must be the result of immigration and the passenger accommodation rendered necessary to meet the exigencies of the traffic would be large enough to warrant the expenditure rendered necessary in this case, even if no other source of traffic were likely to be found, but he believed that, over and above

this, it would be found that the route would create a special passenger traffic of its own.
