It might be inquired, if the advantages were as great as represented, why there had been no effort up till now to realize them, but he had to reply that until the construction of the Intercolonial Railway was completed, these advantages could not be of themselves apparent. The construction of the Atlantic Cable had also distracted public attention from the subject, although previous to that a good deal of interest had in reality been felt in it. It might also be argued that it was essentially a summe route, which he granted was partially true, but he also had to reply that the trade which it. was intended to accommodate was also essentially a summer trace. The diffiulty of transhipment at Valencia and St. George's will also likely be taken as an objection to the proposed route, but he did not propose that it should be available for goods traffic, except of the very lightest description, and should be confined as much as possible to the convey ance of mails and passengers. He, however, had no objection to making Milford Haven, instead of Valencia, the terminus of the English and Cape Breton the terminus for the Canadian goods traffic, which would entirely obviate this objection and yet greatly shorten the passage.
