Lines on the Death of Serjeant Thos. Rose.

Oh!"twas a sad and solemn scene That dying comrade's bed, Where faithful friends around him hung. Or moved with silent tread .-And there he lay : his manly frame How wasted, weak, and worn-A shadow pointing to the grave-

Of all its glory shorn. How shortly since in healthful glow, In manly beauty's pride, He moved with gay and laughing eye, And youth's elastic stride .-Now listless, languid, rolls that eye, The haughty step is gone; The merry thought—the careless glance— Are now forever flown.

Oh! kind and gentle was his heart: And manly were his ways: And many deeds, in secret done. Might Jaim our loudest praise : Yet he had sinn'd like other men. Had trod temptation's path, Had deeply drank sin's seeming sweets, And felt sin's biting wrath.

And oh! how sweet to think that he Left life and all belind, And quit this changing troubled world With calm and happy mind : For with sincere and earnest prayer, He long had firmly striven, To cast away all earthly thoughts-

To think alone of heaven. And who that saw that closing scene, So full of peace and rest, But saw Religion's power supreme In radiance bright confest; And who that heard his words of hope, . Of thankfulness and praise, But wished that they, with faith like his Might calmly end their days.

Then fare thee-well my well lov'd friend-Farewell my comrade dear-Not mine alone the sigh of grief, Nor yet the parting tear; For all thy comrade's tears of love, Shall wet thy grave's green sod, Yet still draw comfort from the thought-Thy soul dwells with its God.
