WEDNESDAY MORNING, MARCH 2, 1853

It is the province of the juvenile Reform Presses to abuse every thing which they cannot understand or are not consulted upon; Government but Mr. W. L. McKenzie, from his age and experience, should be above such a practice. After quoting the whole of the Hastings Chronicle's attack upon the appointment of J. J. Burrowes, Esquire, to the Judgeship of these United Counties, Mr. McKenzie, in forward. his latest Message, thus writes :-

Now Mr. McKenzie knows that there are Three Reform papers in Kingston, none of which said one word about this appointment, and he might have suspected that there were good reasons for it. And, again, instead of adding his weighty condemnation to the Duny malice of the Chron cle, as a Legisla Mor, he could have asked the Attorney General respecting the matter, who would have satisfied him of its correctness.

(From the Watertown Reformer, Feb. 24.) On Tuesday evening of lust week, a large and highly appreciating audience assembled at Apollo Hall, to hear Mr. Dewey read the play of Julius wer presented a polished historic picture of the manner they have for the past three or four of Queen Elizabeth, the patroness of letters and nors, is simply to enumerate their titles and ar', and under whose queenly auspices the immortal bard of Avonsung his ever-living and sublime | places of publication :-strains. No. 457, 458, 459. | hours. commercial, civil, and literary advancement, was compared, or contrasted rather, with our own boastful age of "new impulses" and "fanciful progress." The lecturer made it appear, as by demonstration, that, intellectually, considering the profundity, scope, majesty, and enduring na "ture of new thoughts and ideas, that our things ar sluggish and dull compared with the age of Shakspeare, who, with Speacer, Milton, Ben. Johnson and Bacon, rendered their own names illustrious, and gave to their times an impress that future ages will not obliterate. For three quarters of an hour the lecturer retained his audience in profound faterest, while he passed in review the illustrious personages of that highly gifted and brilliant era. From thence he passed to the play of Julius Cmsar, which was read with a nice appreciation and accurate exhibition of the spirit, dignity, patriotism, and passion that pervade that play.

Mr. Dewey possess rare powers as a writer an speaker, and never, to our knowledge, has he offered an entertainment when he has not more than answered the highest expectations of his numerous friends and admirers. Powers so well -calculated to please and instruct, and impress the minds of men, are worthy of a wider field of exercise than the moderate estimate of them, by the possesser, has yet allowed them to range. We would not that he should " o'erstep the modesty of nature" and obtrude upon the public taste and judgment; but justice to himself requires that he let the community judge of the value and interest of his efforts, and that he answer, as far as his time and other engagements will permit, the popular desire to hear him.

* * We have just been informed that it is Mr. Dewey's intention to visit Kingston shortly. We shall look forward to the occasion with pleasure, as will also all of our citizens. Intellectual entertainments such as those of Mr. D. agree with the advancing taste of the age, and we do not hazard much when we promise, him a warm recepation from the people of Kingston.
