"One person," says he, "out of every eight The opening of the legislative bodies took is a pauper." I believe, on the contrary, that the working people of England were never in a more thriving condition, and that it requires but a few more improvements to place them on a footing nearly equal to the physicial condition of those in the United States.

He charges us with defective supplies for the education of our people. Let him perambulate the country and the towns, and observe everywhere the rapid multiplication of schools and churches. "London," he proceeds, " contains 33,000 needlewomen, who earn, on an average, only 41d. a-day by working 14 hours." An offer was made, through myself, a short time ago, to provide lodging and 6s. a week for 200 or 300 female hands required in the North of England. The proposition was laid before this formerly suffering class, but rejected, bescause their actual condition was so much bet ter in London.

He speaks of the factory classes with commiseration. He would do well to visit the great hives of industry in Lancanshire and Yorkshire. He would there see a prosperous, active, and contented population; work is abundant, and wages good; the best feeling exists between the employer and the employ ed, while a large proportion of them, both children and social improvement. The great Factory Bazaar at Bolton will fully justify This assertion.

"A very large proportion," he continues, of your agricultural population live in filthy and crowded costages," &c. This, I regret to say, is still true, both in town and country. But have no efforts been made-are none being made-to abate the evil? To quote but one instance-Did not the Duke of Bedford lately erect 400 cottagss. I believe in a single year? I can answer, from personal inspection, for excellence. Are not many other landowners, in all parts of the kingdom, engared at present in the same course? The reduction of the duty on bricks has greatly facilitated such operations.

place on the 13th ult. The members of the Senate and Legislative corps, and other officials, proceeded to the Tui eries, where the Emperor, accompanied by the Empress, ad dressed them in the following speech Senators and Deputies : A year scince I called you together in this place to inaugurate the constitution promulgated in virtue of the powers with which the people conferred on me. Scince that period tranquillity has not been Thas hallowed the return to their home of the majority of the men who were made the subject of necessary severity. The riches of the nation have increased to such a point that that portion of our floating capital, the value of which can be estimated, amounts to about two milliards. The activity of labour developes itself in every branch of industry.

The same progress is being realized in Africa, where our army has just distinguished itself by heroic successes. The form of the government has been changed, without any shock, by the free suffiages of the people. Great works have been undertaken without the ciefation of any new tax, and without a loan, Peace has been maintained without servility All the Powers have ricognized the new government. France has now institutions which can defend themselves, and the stability of which do not depend on the life of one man

These results have not cost great efforts because they were in the minds and for the interest of all. To those who woulddoubt their importance I will reply that scarce'y fou teen months ago France was delivered up to the hazards of anarchy To those who may regret that a wiser field has not been given to liberty, I will reply, that liberty has never aided in founding a durable political edifice; it crowns it when it has been consolodated by time. I et us, besides not forget that the immense majority of the country has confidence in the present and faith in the future ; there still remains incorrigible individuals, who, forgetful of their own experience, of their past terrors, and of their disapointments, obstinately presist in paying no attention to the national will deny the reality of facts, and in the hidst of a sea, which every day grows more and more calm, call for tempests in which
