Pekin, and it seems probable that they may now advance upon the capital with accelerated speed. The Imperial troops seem totally unable to impede their progress. A commereial circular from Canton says :--

Our information of late is gained chiefly from the Pekin Gazettes, and from the proclacause in as favorable a light as possible. But from the former we learn the important intelligence of the loss of Fung Yang, a large city of Ngan-hwui, lying to the north-west of Nankin, and of the further unimpeded advance of the insurgents towards the Yellow River; and from the latter we can learn the barrenness of the treasury, the apathy of the people, and the desperate straits to which the Government is reduced. To raise money, every device which can be contrived has been resorted to, subscriptions have been called for in different provinces, and literary and political honors have been promised as rewards to those who contribute largely. New taxes bave been laid, especially in Pekin itself, and the injudicious rigor with which they have been levied has turned the affections of the inhabitants from the Government, so that that city is likely to fall an easy prey when the rebels appear before it.

They will have no place of refuge, however, and will doubtless lose their lives. The question then arises, can or will business be carried on under these circumstances? The answer is purely conjectural; but we are inclined to believe, reasoning from the analogy of Amoy, that a cessation for a longer or a shorter period must ensue. If the subversion of the government, however, be effected, not by an effort of the people, but by a strong force of the insurgent army, the latter may have power at once to establish new officers, and to inspire the necessary confidence in the minds of the bankers and merchants.
