The Faded Flower.

Like a dimple begot by a smile, Like a spirit untainted by guile.

In the shade of a jassamine bower, I cherished and worshipped an idel, A rare and a radiant flower With a holy and heavenly power.

in | With tears did I water its petals, I fanned it and fanned it with sighs, And was glad when the dew in its bosom Reflected the light of my eyes; And I thought that its beauty was fairer Than the lilies that bloom in the skies.

Was sleeping and dreaming of bliss, And he tarried a moment to kiss That was sleeping and dreaming of bliss.

It drooped in its beauty, and withered, Death stole its pure fragrance so sweet; Its delicate petals then faded, And it fell in the dust at my feet, And my soul was drawn down to the ruin That was crushed in the dust at my feet.

For the flower that I worshipped was rooted. In the flesh of my quivering heart, And Death was too weak to discover, With the aid of his conquering dart, The tendrills that tenderly clustered Round the flesh of my quivering heart.

In the grave with my beautiful flower, My desolate heart is asleep. In her chamber so silent and deep.
