TIM AND HIS DOG.

Ragged, starving, his thin face blue and sinched with the cold, he stood, offering his matches to the unheeding, burrying passers by. It had been bitterly cold all day, and all day he had trudged the streets, trying in vain to make a copper or two wherewith to buy a meal and pay for a shelter this bitter night. Homeless and friendless he stood there, claiming no home but the workhouse, calling none friend but the terrier trembling at his beels. An earnest little face lie had, stamped with that look of patience which is born only of suffering bravely endured. The clear out features were sharpened by cold and hunger, the blue eyes piteous in their glance as he scanned the faces in the moving throng. He shivered every now and then as the keen wind swept round the corner, blowing skide his fluttering rags, and making the gaslight flicker in the lamps; but his voice was cheerful as he beat down to speak to the dog cowering at his feet. "Cold, Smut?"

Smut pressed a little closer to the boy's side, giving a monosyllable wag to his tail in answer to his master's words. The slow serinutes passed, and each moment the boy's hunger and weariness increased. " Taint o' no use, Smut," he said at length, in a tone of dejection; "we shan't sell to night. Tis too windy fur the swells to smoke, and when 'tis so cold they won't unbutton their coats fur to take out a penny. The deg's tail drooped dejectedly, and he heaved a long sigh as he looked up questioningly into his master's face. "Keep up yer courage, ole man," continued the boy, with forced cheeriness. "We'll do better to-morrer, and we've spent a windy night on Blackfriars bridge afore now."

As he dragged himself wearily along the brightly lighted Strand, he paused for a moment outside a confectioner's window. Flattening his face against the glass, he gazed bungrily at the roast beef and turkey and plum pudding so temptingly displayed within. brough the grating from the kitchen below came savory odors which filled the boy with longing and the dog with restless excitement. They had eaten nothing since the morning. and in this fasting condition a night on Blackfriars bridge was not a cheering prospect. Two ladies walking quickly up the street were struck by the pathetic little figure. The brilliant light from the shop window fell full upon the small pinched face and eager blue eyes, upon the untidy shock of reddish hair and the fluttering rags., The look of hunger was unmistakable, and it moved the elder lady to pity. "Stop him for a moment, Edith: I must get him something to eat," she said, hastily The pretty, fair baired girl laid her hand on the boy's shoulder as he slowly turned away from the window.

"You are hungry?" she questioned, closely examining the intense, little face upturned to He nodded emphatically, looking up with wondering eyes at this beautiful, low voiced lady, whose cold, sweet tones seemed so full of tenderness to him.

"You are often hungry!" she continued. "Most always," he answered, laconically. "Well, here's a penny for you, and my friend will bring you out something to eat in a minute.

The boy was too much surprised to answer, but his sharp eyes were full of gratitude as he awkwardiy touched his cap. "Should you like to earn three pence tomorrow morning," she asked, still regarding the boy with eager interest. "Rather!" he answered, quickly. "There ain't many things as I wouldn't do fur thri-"Do you know where Suffolk street is?" "Second turning to yer right," he said

"Come at 11 o'clock," she said, "and ask for Miss Munro. I am going to make a picture of you-send you to the Grosvenor if you are a success. If you are a good boy you shall have three pence a day until the picture At this moment the other lady came out of the shop with a parcel in ber hand. "Here is something to eat, my boy," she said, in a comfortable, motherly way. "Take it home and have a good meal. Now, Edith, if you are ready.

He watched them silently till they passed out of sight, his eyes round with astonish

"Here's a go!" he murmured, as he turned away from the brightly lighted window. "Thripence a day-why, I shall make my fortun'! Come, Smut, we'll find a doorstep and ent our supper. Oh, here's a go!"

Turning down a by street they soon found sheltered doorstep on which they seated themselves. Smut pressed close to his master's side, eagerly sniffing at the parcel which the boy proceeded to open with fingers trembling with excitement.

"Beef, roast beef! Ain't we in luck, Smut? And hot 'taters and bread! Oh, Smut, ain't she a stunner, and no mistake?" The food was consumed in rapturous lence, while the icy wind swept by unregarded by the happy pair in their sheltered

"No nasty bridge for us, Smut; she gave me a penny, and we'll sleep in a jolly warm room to-night," said the boy presently, holding out the greasy paper for the dog to lick,

"My eye! ain't we in luck? Thripence a day, Smut, that comes to one and six a week. Oh, sha'n't we be rich!" Smut thumped his short tail loudly in reponse, and pushed his cold nose affectionately against his master's cheek. "Thripence a day if I'm a good boy," he went on reflectively. "But, Smut, I ain't a good boy. I swear at the chaps when they call me 'Carrots,' and I lick 'em when they say you're a ugly brute. Good boys don't fight and swear. If she finds out as I ain't good I s'pose she won't make a pictur' o' me no more-she'll stop the thripence a day. But she sha'n't find out, ole man. I'll tell her I'm a pious chap as goes to the Sunday school. Gentlefolks think a deal o'they, Smut. Ain't they green, just?

At 11 o'clock next morning he was admit ted into the house in Suffolk street by a neat maid servant, who eyed him suspiciously as she curtly told him to follow her upstairs. He was shown into a large, barely furnished room at the top of the house, where he found his friend of the previous night scated before said. "Now, will you stand on that platform, and turn towards the window ;- that's right. Now, lean forward a little, just as you were when I saw you looking in at the shop last night-that's capital. Stand just like that and keep as still as you can." For some minutes she worked silently,

As Tim walked slowly down Suffolk street one morning a mighty resolve formed itself his mind. He ran up stairs burriedly, fearing-that his courage might forsake him if he gave himself time for thought, and his first feeling on finding the room unoccupied was one of disappointment. Smut curled himself up in his usual corner near the window, and Tim stationed himself before the easel, looking bitterly at the ragged figure which met his gaze. *

"You a good boy!" he said, regarding the painting contemptuously. "You look like it, been a very good boy. Tim, and the picture don't you! Your little game's 'bout done, ole man; you'll see the last of her." He took his place quietly when she came in, his heart beating heavily under his ragged jackes as he gazed out lently upon the patch of gray sky. The unusual silence struck the girl, and she regarded him with something akin to interest as he stood there with the light falling upon his rigid little face. "What makes you so quiet to-day, Tim!

Has Smut been a bad dog!" "No, it ain't Smut," returned the boy, drearily. "It's me that's been bad." "Why, what have you done!" she asked, her eyes growing warm with amusement. 'Twas the very first day I come here," he in the same dreary tones, never removing his gaze from the window. "I told you a crammer; I said as how I went to church and | isn't it!" to Sunday school." "And it was not true?" she questioned,

"Never been inside a church, cept to warm myself," he answered, doggedly. "Never been to Sunday school in all my born days." "What made you tell such a story?" she inquired, the ludicrous side of the scene alone

"Wanted you to think I was a good chap, he returned in a low shamed voice. "You said you'd give me thripehce a day if I was a good boy." "And why do you tell me about it now!"

she asked curiously. "Is it because you know that I cannot finish the picture without you?" "No, it ain't!" he answered roughly, looking found from the window for the first "Don't know 'xackly, but it ain't that," he said more quietly. "Don't you know that it is very naughty to tell stories!" she questioned, with an uncomfortable sense that some rebuke was required "S'pose so," he answered humbly.

"Well, we'll say no more about it," she said vaguely. "But don't you do it again," When Tim entered the studio next day be found Miss Munro sitting before her easel, looking pale and languid. "I shall not want you this morning." she said wearily. "I am not well enough to "You look awful white," said the boy "You can come to-morrow as usual," she continued in the same subdued tone. "I dare say I shall be fit for work to-morrow.' "Hope you'll feel better soon," he said as he awkwardly moved away. He walked slowly down the street and

It was his private belief that his master overrated Miss Munro's charms. "She's hard up," said Tim, after a pause. "She's awful hard up, Smut. She ain't got no money to buy any breakfast-that's why she looked so white. And we had bread and hot coffee!" he ended, with a sob. For some minutes he was silent, his eyes wide and miserable as they rested on the gray stretch of water, but his face cleared presently, Syrup is really a good thing, pleasant, and a smile parted the small lips.

"I've got it!" he cried triumphan'ly, raising his arms from the wall. "Pil tell her to-mor-It was with shy eagerness that Tim entered the studio next day. His little face was pale and pinched, for he had tasted no food that morning; but his expression was one of entire happiness. In his hand he carried a parcel done up in a dingy piece of newspaper, and this he proceeded to lay timidly upon the

"Why, what is this?" she questioned, regarding the boy curiously from her high stool, as she sat before the easel. "It feets quite hot." "It's - it's 'taters," he said, awkwardly.

"Potatoes!" she echoed in amazement. "They're-I brought 'em for you," he explained, rubbing one thin leg against the other nervously. "Most think roast 'taters prime-I never touch 'em myself," he added hastily; "no more does Smut. Come here, sir!" as the dog snuffed longingly at the parcel still lying unopened on the girl's lap. She looked helplessly from the parcel to th boy and back at the parcel again, and then the room rang with her merry laugh. "Thank you," she said, as soon as she could speak. "I-I will look at them presently Will you put them in the fender-for the | Flower will prove its wonderful effect.

Tim experienced a vague feeling of disap pointment as he silently obeyed. He had hoped to have the pleasure of seeing her eat these potatoes, for which he and Smut had gone breakfastless this bitter morning, and her laughter had pained without enlightening him. He was almost glad when at length she told him that he might go, for he did not feel at ease in her presence to-day.

"Here is your money," she said. "It is sixpence this morning; I forgot to pay you yes

Secret Rehearsal in London.

The greatest secrecy prevails during the rehearsels of the new Gilbert-Sullivan opera at the London Savoy. No outsider's presence is allowed in any part of the theatre. If but a chink be open of any door in pit, boxes or gallery, a warning shout is raised at once until the door is closed. When the performers have occasion to accost one another during rehearsel, they do so as A, B, C. So great is the fear of piracy that even the actors themselves do not know the name of the play nor the names of the chracters they are severally engaged to represent .- Lon-
