LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

The Salvationists.

(To the Editor of THE NEWS.) Sir, -Mr. Horace Beech wishes me to state in justice to a member of the legal profession, who is accused of writing the The Bicyclist Who Made a Tour of the etters to the Whig and News, which caused the salvation army so much trouble, that he was the author of those communications. He employed Mr. Darley Allen, a gentleman who has ably written on the same subject to New York and Buffalo papera, to compose the letters for him. I hope you will publish the foregoing as H. Beech desires to show the people of Kingston and the salvation army, that he is not afraid to sign his name to any article which he has written or been the means of having written. M. E. Bowny.

THE BOULEVARDIER.

THE CONCENTRATED AND SUBLI MATED ESSENCE OF PARISIANISM.

The Boulevardier Not Necessarily French by Birth-The Charm and Grace of Parisian Life-The Annals of a Day.

The Boulevardier is not necessarily Parisian or even French by birth. Some of the most noted have been Russians, Americans, Austrians, Belgians and Germans, who brough long years of residence in Paris had ecome more Parisian than the Rarisians, but rarely or never English. The Boulevardier only flourishes at night. It requires the light of the Boulevards and the shops, the heated atmosphere of the theatres, the biaze of gas over the baccarattables, or the shaded candles of the "cabinet particular" to develop the latent powers inwas obliged to furnish bonds to keep the herent in him. Then he blossoms out and shines resplendent, bright, dazzling, effervescent, witty. When he first emerges in the late aftermoon from his seclusion it is to drive or ride in the Bois to attend an exhisition of paintings or famous sale of old curiosities and art treasures, to inhale the element in which he thrives, the air of the boulevards, or perhaps to spend an hour at the baccarat table reposing, preparing for To understand the French character and appreciate the charm and grace of Parisian life it is necessary not only to live among the people and to know the language thoroughly, but when that is acquired to learn the subtleties and finesses of the language of the clubs, the life of a boulevarder IN THE SACRED CIRCLE.

If you are admitted to the sacred circle you will become more than convinced, you will become enthusiastic, provided always that you like and appreciate culture and art in its manifold varieties and that you are not a Puritan. You will join this inner circle, this concentrated essence of all that is beautiful and attractive and intelligent. You will become witty yourself, even if you never suspected such a quality in you, by contrast lated intelligence. You will acquire a keen artistic taste and appreciation, and you will On Sunday Mr. O Brien addressed a rejoice and be happy in an atmosphere where metallic weight, where it is little thought of or spoken of, and where a new play or a new NOTICE OF tions of the bourse, of which indeed scarcely one of your companions could give you a MR.

You will drive your own horses instead of occasionally hising one. But your associates will be the same, your life the same-the theaters no more interesting, the club no more attractive, the art exhibition no more agreeable and the suppers and conversation no more amusing. Indeed your money will be a drawback if relied upon or displayed at all. The Boulevardier, as a rule, is not rich and cannot associate with men who spend much money. You will begin your day by a late breakfast and a glance at The Figaro or Gaulois. when you will take a ride or a drive to the Bois in the soft baliny air of spring up the Champ Elysees with the trees in bloom and the odors of the blossoms wafted toward you as you pass. You will see thousands of people driving onward in graceful, gay equipages, a section of those whom the world has treated well; descendants of the old nobility of France, whose ancestors fought in the crusades, fell at Crecy or Agincourt, conquered at Fontenoy, and perhaps fought side by side with your great-grandfather in the revolution; children and grandchildren of Napoleon's generals, who carried the eagles the steppes of Russia to the English channel
