OVER THE RIO GRANDE.

The Old Adobe Town of Paso Del Norte. Scenes Along the Railroad. Crossing the iron bridge over the Rio Grande the first place is Paso Del Norte, a Mexican town of about 6,000 inhabitants. It is an old adobe town embowered in trees and vines. As we passed rapidly through its dusty streets and glided by its gay houses surrounded by high adobe walls, beautiful gardens, rich with flowers and trees of magnificent foliage, were to be seen on either side. Here and there a picturesque group of natives, clad in cotton shirts and pants, their heads shaded by straw sombreros of huge dimensions, were at work in the fields or idling beneath the shade of magnificent trees. Again they were to be seen tramping behind the patient burro, or riding that useful animal through the dusty streets. It is a comical sight to see a little, dusky, long eared animal carrying a native whose feet are hanging within a foot or so of mother earth; or packing a load of wood or hay so large that one can only see a head decorated with a pair of long ears, four feet in rapid motion and a tail wagging as if it expressed naught but pleasure and contentment. In the doors and windows now and then we caught a glimpse of a senorita, who favored us with a glance from a pair of sparkling eyes. Little bare legged urchins seemed to be plentiful, and as they ran out in the dust to view the train or stood clinging timidly to their mother's skirts we could not help wondering what their ideas of the iron horse were and what changes American capital and energy would make in their land ere and manhood. Paso Del Norte lies in beautiful valley and the surrounding mountains standing with the shadows of the setting sun upon them, enhanced the scene by their picturesqueness. In a few moments we arrived at the Mexican Central station, a fine adobe structure with an open court, in the center of which were magnificent tropical plants and flowers. There are ample verandas on all sides, on which open offices, waiting rooms and a restaurant. After partaking of a good supper we attended to our baggage. The custom officers examined it and placed a card on every article, which permitted it to enter the republic. They were very courteous and by no means prying in their examin-

Leaving Paso Del Norte we pass through the country south, along valleys surrounded by low mountain ranges and through the rich pastures of San Juan, Encinales and Sanz. Each little station pours forth its crowd of dusky inhabitants, and although we hear known sign of Wells-Fargo, we look in vain for the enterprising American. Venders of their goods upon each side of us wherever we trails run in all directions. As there are no whistle, and as we crane our necks out of the window we see cattle and other animals scampering away from the train. Night approaching we withdrew from the windows, and after whiling away a few hours card playing, singing, etc., we retired to our com-fortable berths.—Cor. San Francisco Chroni-
