TECHNICAL OBJECTIONS.

The case of Mr. Adam Hudspeth who was elected for South Victoria but who somewhat singular one. Mr. Hudepeth was revising officer for North Victoria.

The franchise ac states that a revising officer shall not be eligible for election, and for two years after he shall not be qualified to be a candidate for the reprewhich he is such officer. The natural inference to be drawn from that is that parlia ment intended that he might be a candidate in any other constituency. Mr.

Hudspath so interpreted the statute. But there is another act, that relating ment, which disqualifies any one holding an office of emolument, and as the revising officership is such a one, some lawyers contend that he is disqualified from running in any place, whereas some very eminent counsel including we understand one of Mr. Blake's own firm whose advice had been taken by the grits, contend that the franchise act having dealt with the extent of his disqualification and being passed since the other act, the latter has no application.

Mr. Hudspeth, however, thought it better not to hold the seat so long as there was any serious doubt about his position and he has taken the honest and manly course of going again to the people. Our grit friends pretend to have the most pro-diet of the majority of the electors, arguing that where the irregularity has been merely technical and did not effect the election that no advantage ought to be taken of such but the voice of the majority should be respected. That

LOVE SONG. From the Century

The moon shines pale in the western aky, Like a pearl set over a brow that blushes There is many a homeward bird in the air, And the hedges thrill with the thrushes. Though my love be further away from me Than the east from the west, or the day from the night,

I have turned my face to his dwelling-place And I bid him "good-night," "good night." Though he less can feel my hurrying breath Than the tree the bird that lilts on its bough, Yet since the winds love's messengers be, same place the public would be put to less They will bear him my kisses, I trow! O moon! shine first on my lips and then Go shine on the forehead of him I love! He will dream perchance that an angel's wing Has quivered his brow above!

> And sing, ye birds, in his ears the song > My heart is singing within my breast:
> It will thrill his heart springs with cestasy. And possess his soul with rest.

Ye too. O fragrance of earth and flower. And voices of n'ght in May Watch near him until in the eastern field Blossom the roses of day.

But thou, O wind! lay close on his lips.
The kisses thou hast in thy flight.

And he will stir in his sleep, and wake And whisper—"My heart—good-night."

> Francis Hodgson Burnett's Boys. A few summers ago one newspaper announced that "Mrs. Burnett very sensibly refrained from trammeling her beautiful boys with any unnecessary clothing, and among the neighbors they were known as the young Arabs." I spent some momenta in absorbed reflection upon this paragraph. My beautiful boys and I have but one slight difference of opinion. My mild arguments have so far usually been refuted by more irresistible ones. Their theory-possibly founded on their perfect artistic training and studious daily contemplation of the antique marblesis that all clothing is unnecessary, and that therefore the sooner it is left in fragment: fluttering on the perfumed zephyrs of spring upon fences, trees, nails, spikes, etc.-the sooner it is lost in the shape of hats, worn into dilapidated ignominy, in the form of shoes, rent and shorn of buttons in any guise whatever, the better for all art in its highest and most noble ideals. The Apollo Belvidere, they doubtless argue, is not burned with the buttons. Why, theh, should they follow the dictates of a deterio rated and vitiated modern taste. In these respects their tendencies are classic in the extreme, but somewhat perverted from my original design, but I object to their being handicapped in their childhood by stupid vulgar, unfounded stories, and 1 advance, with due modesty, the statement that my taste for the picturesque has not yet led me to transform two healthy, manly, robust boys larities whenever they happened to have into affected, abnormal, self-conscious little mountebanks.-Frances Hodgson Burnett in Detroit Free Press.
