The distant muttering of thunder that they had heard had died away, and now the great storm swept on in silent majesty, like the passage of a ghostly host, from which there arose no sound of feet or rolling of wheels. Only before it sped the swift angels of the wind, and behind it swung the curtain of the Even as Muller spoke a gust of icy air

> For a few yards, ten or fifteen perhaps, all went well, and then John suddenly discovered that they were getting into deep water; the two leaders were evidently almost off their legs, and could scarcely stand against the current of the flooded river. "Damn you!" he shouted back, "there is no drift bere." "Go on, go on, it is all right!" came Muller's voice in answer.

John said no more, but, putting out all his strength, tried to get his horses round. Jees turned berself on the seat to look, and just then came a blase of lightning which revealed Muller and his two companions standing dismounted on the bank, the muzzles of their rifles pointing straight at the cart. "Oh, God!" she acreamed, "they are going to shoot us." Even as the words passed her lips three tongues of flame flared out from the rifles' mouths and the Zulu, Mouti, sitting by her side, pitched heavily forward on to his head into the bottom of the cart, while one of the wheelers reared straight up into the air with a shrick of agony and came down with a splash into the river. And then followed a scene the horrors of which baffles my poer pen. Overhead the storm burst in fury, and flash after flash of fork, or rather of chain, lightning fell into the river. The thunder, too, began to crack like the trump of doom; the wind rushed down, tearing the surface of the water into foam, and, catching under the tent of the cart, lifted it clean off the wheels, so that it began to float. Then the two leaders, mad with fear by the fury of the storm and the dying struggles of the off-wheeler, plunged and tore at the traces till they actually rent themselves loose and vanished between the darkness overhead and the boiling water beneath. Away floated the cart, now touching the bottom and now riding on the water like a-boat, oscillating this way and that, and slowly turning round and round. With it floated the dead horse, dragging down the other wheeler beneath the water. It was awful to see his struggles in the glare of the lightning, but at last he sank and choked,

And meanwhile, sounding sharp and clear across the din and hubbub of the storm, came the cracking of the three rifles whenever the flashes showed the whereabouts of the cart to the murderers on the bank. Mouti was lying still in the bottom on the bed plank, a bullet between his broad shoulders and another in his skull; but John felt that his life was yet whole in him, though something had hissed past his face and stung it. Instinctively he reached across the cart and drew Jess on t his knee, and cowered over her, thinking dimly that perhaps his body would protect her from the bullets.

Rip! rip! through the wood and canvas phut! phut! through the air; but some mer ciful power protected them, and though one cut John's coat and two passed through the skirt of Jess' dress, not a bullet struck them. And very soon the shooting began to grow wild, and then that dense vail of rain came down and wrapped them so close that even-the lightning could not show their whereabouts to the assassins on the bank.

"Stop shooting," said Frank Muller; "the cart has sunk, and there is an end of them, No human being can have lived through that fire and the Vaal in flood,"

The two Boers ceased firing, and the Uni corn shook his head softly and remarked to his companion that the damned English people in the water could not be much wetter than they were on the bank. It was a curious thing to say at such a moment, but probably the spirit that animated the remark was not so much callousness as that which animated Cromwell, who flipped the ink in his neighbor's face when he signed the death warrant of his king. Muller was also thinking of the warrant which he had forged. He must get it back somehow, even if--"Let us take shelter under the bank there. There is a flat place, about fifty yards up, where the bank lies over. This rain i drowning us. We can't upsaddle till it clears. I must have a nip of brandy, too. Almighty! I can see that girl's face now! the lightning shone on it just as I shot. Well, she will be in heaven now, poor thing, if English people ever go to heaven." seeds and avoid reaping a harvest of suf-It was the Unicorn who spoke, and the Vilderbeeste made no reply, but advanced with him to where the horses stood. They took the patient brutes that were waiting for their masters, their heads well down and the water streaming from them, and led them along with them. Frank Muller stood by his own horse thinking, and watched them vanish into the gloom. How was he to get that warrant back without dyeing his hands even redder than they were!

As he thought, an answer came. For at that moment, accompanied by a fearful thunderclap, there shot from the storm overhead, which had now nearly passed away, one of those awful flashes that sometimes end an African tempest. It lit up the whole scene round as light as day, and right in the white peart of it Muller saw his two companions in crime and their horses as the great king saw the men in the furnace. They were about forty paces from him, on the crest of the bank. He saw them, one moment erect; the next-men and horses falling this way and that, prone to the earth. And then it was all dark again. He staggered with the shock, and when it had passed rushed to the spot, calling the men by name; but no answer came, except the echo of his voice. He was there now, and the moonlight began to struggle faintly through the rain. Its pale trace of dandruff; for sale everywhere, beams lit upon two outstretched forms-one { Take nothing else. A.
