CONDEMNED TO DEATH. Half an nour passed in silence, which was only broken by the footsteps of the sentries as they tramped, or rather leitered, up and down, or by the occasional fall of some calcined masonry from the walls of the burnedout house. What between the smell of smoke wall there blew a little draught, and by this against the wall so as to get the full benefit carts and timber out of it, leaving one buck | the fatal word. wagon, however, placed along the wall on the side opposite to the crack through which she was looking. Then they pulled the Scotch cart over to her side, laughing about some-thing among themselves as they did so, and your crimes. Next, out of the further corner of the place, they extracted an old saw lench and set it at the top of the open space. Then Bessie understood what they were doing; they were arranging a court, and the saw bench was the judge's chair. So Frank Muller meant to carry out his threat!

Shortly after this all the Boers, except those who were keeping guard, filed into the place and began to clamber on the buck wagon, seating themselves with much rough joking in a double row upon the broad side rails. Next appeared Hans Coetzee, his head bound up in a bloody bandkerchief. He was pale and shaky, but Bessie could see that he was but little the worse for his wound. Then came Frank Muller himself, looking white and very terrible, and as he came the men stopped their joking and laughing. Indeed, part of Boer organization is that it is practically impossible to get one Boer to pay deference to or obey another; but this was certainly not the case where Frank Muller was Muller advanced without hesitation to the saw bench at the top of the space, and sat down on it, placing his rifle between his knees. After this there was a pause, and next minute Bessie saw her old uncle conducted in by two armed Boers, who halted in the middle of the space, about three paces from the saw bench, and stood one on either side of their prisoner. At the same time Hans Coetzee climbed up into the Scotch cart, and Muller drew a note book and a pencil from his pocket. "Silence!" he said. "We are assembled here to try the Englishman, Silas Croft, by court martial. The charges against him are that by word and deed, notably by continuing to fly the English flag after the country had been surrendered to the republic, he has traitprously rebelled against the government of the country. Further, that he has attempted to murder a burgher of the republic by shooting at him with a loaded rifle. If these charges are proved against him he will be liable to death, by martial law. Prisoner

"I am an English subject. I only defended my house after you had murdered one of, my servants. . I deny your jurisdiction over me, and I refuse to plead."

Frank Muller made some notes in his pocket book, and then said, "I overrule the prisoner's objection as to the jurisdiction of the court. As to the charges, we will now take evidence. Of the first charge no evidence is needed, for we all saw the flag flying. As to the second, Hans Coetzee, the assaulted burgher, will now give evidence. Hans Coetzee, do you swear in the name of God and the republic to speak the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth!" "Almighty, yes," answered Hans from the eart on which he had enthroned himself, "so help me, the dear Lord." "Proceed then."

"I was entering the house of the prisoner to arrest him, in obedience to your worshipful commands, when the prisoner lifted a gun and fired at me. The bullet from the gun struck me on the ear, cutting it and putting me to much pain and loss of blood. That is the evidence I have to give."

"That's right, that is not a lie," said some the men on the wagon. "Prisoner, have you any question to the witness?" said Muller. "I have no questions to ask; I deny your jurisdiction," said the old man with spirit. "The prisoner declines to question the witness, and again pleads to the jurisdiction, a plea which I have overruled. Gentlemen, do you desire to hear any further evidence!"

"Do you then find the prisoner guilty of the charges laid against him?" "Yes, ves," from the wagon.

Muller made a further note in his book and "Then, the prisoner having been found guilty of high treason and attempted murder, be only matter that remains is the question of the punishment required to be meted out by the law to such wicked and horrible of enses. Every man will give his verdict, having duly considered if there is any way by which, in accordance with the holy dictates of his conscience, and with the natural promptings to pity in his heart, he can extend mercy to the prisoner. As commandant and president of the court the first vote lies with me; and I must tell you, gentlemen, that I feel the responsibility a very hearty one in the sight of God and my country; and I must also warn you not to be influenced or overruled by my decision, who am, like you, only a man, liable to err and be led away." "Hear, hear," said the voices on the wagon, is be paused to note the effect of his address.

"Gentlemen and burghers of the state, my natural promptings in this case are toward pity. The prisoner is an old man, who has lived many years among us like a brother. Indeed, he is a 'voortrekker,' and, though an Englishman, one of the fathers of the land. Can we condemn such a one to a bloody grave, more especially as he has a niece de-

"Gentlemen, those sentiments do you honor, My own heart cried but now 'No, no; whatever his sins have been, let the old man go free.' But then came reflection. True, the prisoner is ofd; but should not age have taught him wisdom! Is that which is not to be forgiven to youth to be forgiven to the ripe experience of many years? May a man murder and be a traitor because he is old?" "No, certainly not!" cried the chorus on the

What could be a fitting punishment for so black hearted a traitor, and how would it be possible to insure the better behavior of other d-d Englishmen, unless they inflicted that punishment? There could, alas! be but one answer-though personally speaking, he uttered it with many tears, and that answer
