

FOR HONOR'S SAKE

By B. L. FARJEON.

The Attorney General—As if in search of some person. Witness—Yes, sir. The Attorney General—Did he make any remark to you? Witness—He said, "If you see a young fellow in a gray coat pass by, you can tell her I am in the square."

The Attorney General—To walk round the square? Witness—Yes, sir. He walked round three or four times. I should say, and every time he came up to me he asked me if I was sure I had not seen the young lady. I was sure she had not passed here.

The Attorney General—In point of fact, did they meet? Witness—A little while afterward I saw them together, talking to each other. They did not walk on the pavement close to the houses, but on the side close to the railing.

The Attorney General—That would be a reasonable construction to put upon the circumstance of their walking during the day, and in the open air, and on the side of the square, near the railing? Witness—Yes, I think so.

The Attorney General—Did he speak to you? Witness—No, sir. The Attorney General—He passed on through the square, on the occasion you have described, when the prisoner left his carriage and returned to this street over his back?

The Attorney General—Did you take any note of the prisoner's dress? Witness—No, sir. The Attorney General—Did you take any note of the prisoner's dress? Witness—No, sir.
