THREE ETON BOYS.

BY W. E. NORRIS.

CHAPTER II.

It was, at this somewhat critical juncture that Lord Staines took it into his head to come down to Staines Court, with the avowed intention of remaining there for a considerable time. His arrival, which had been preceded by that of his French cook, his house steward, his groom of the chambers, and heaven only knows how many other domestic functionaries (for his style of living had always been far in excess of that warranted by his income), caused quite a little stir in the vicinity, and set everybody conjecturing as to its causes. What these were was revealed to us the next morning by Lady Mildred, who lost no time in walking over to see my mother.

"Papa has been very unlucky this year," she said, in her gentle, matter of course way. "First of all, his horse lost the Derby by a head, as you know"——

"My dear," interrupted my mother, "I am afraid I know nothing about the Derby, except that it is a race which takes place every spring."

"No, you wouldn't. But papa knows a great deal about it, and even I know something. Premier must have won if he had not been interfered with. It was nobody's fault, but it was poor papa's misfortune; and since then he has been unlucky at Ascot also. So there is to be no yachting this summer, and we are going to remain here quietly and ask hardly anybody to stay with us, and Bracknell is coming down in a few days, so that it will be quite like old times again. But I am afraid he will find it too dull to stay long."

Bracknell at the age of 23 was probably very much what my tutor had anticipated that he would be. He was one of the handsomest young men about London; he was immensely in request with that class who have come to be known in these latter days as "smart people;" his affairs de coeur had been numerous and a trifle ostentatious; he was owner, or part owner, of several horses which had achieved a certain celebrity, and he was pretty deeply in debt. I should be puzzled to say what good qualities he possessed beyond that of pluck, but I do not in the least wonder at his great popularity. Jim, who persisted in regarding him as a bright particular star, was overjoyed on hearing that he proposed to honor our quiet neighborhood with his presence for a time, and it struck me that Hilda's eyes glistened when this cheering intelligence was conveyed to her.

We all—that is, the Turners, Jim and myself—were invited to dine at Staines Court on the evening of his arrival, and I declare that we had not been seated at the table for five minutes before it was perfectly clear to me that Miss Hilda intended to make him her captive. What put this beyond a doubt was the obstinacy with which she declined to have anything to say to him. Lord Staines, who took her into dinner, was obviously depressed and preoccupied when we sat down; but Hilda put forth all her very considerable powers of pleasing, and by the time that the fish was removed she had contrived to put her neighbor in the best of good spirits. No man was more truly appreciative of feminine beauty and wit than Lord Staines. Meanwhile Bracknell, who had old Turner on his right hand, speedily realized that he had a very charming person on his left; and it was not a little amusing to see the look of blank astonishment which overspread his features when, after repeated attempts to attract Hilda's notice, it dawned upon him that she really preferred his father's conversation to his own. I suppose that never before in his life had he known a charming person display such extraordinary taste. In vain he brought his ingenuous arts to bear upon her and forced her to look round while he shot anguishing glances full into her eyes. The glances failed to arouse any response; she gave him politely and plainly to understand that his interruptions were unwelcome, answered him with a few monosyllables or a faint smile, and immediately turned away to resume her remarks to Lord Staines, who was evidently much tickled by the discomfiture of his heir apparent.

Jim all this time was very pleasantly engaged in talking over by-gone days with Lady Mildred, only every now and again his eyes wandered to Hilda and rested upon her with a ridiculous look of pride and affection. Doubtless he was thinking how good it was of her to take so much trouble to amuse the old gentleman at the head of the table. As for the Rev. Simeon and myself, we eat our dinner, which was an excellent one, and nobody took the smallest notice of us.

Later in the evening, when we assembled in the drawing room, Lord Staines became grave and silent once more, black Care having, I presume, recalled herself to his memory. Very soon he murmured some excuse and slipped away—perhaps to try and establish a balance between revenue and expenditure in his study. Lady Mildred had some photographs to show to Jim, who may or may not have been interested in them as he professed to be; Mr. Turner, for lack of a more worthy listener, was fain to favor me with his views upon the subject of secular education; and while he was expounding these at some length, I saw exactly what I had expected to see. Bracknell seated himself upon a sofa beside Hilda, who put up her fan and received him with a side glance which was half supercilious, half encouraging. He began to address her in a low tone of remonstrance. Presumably he was begging to be informed why she had treated him with such marked coolness, for presently I heard her reply, laughing slightly, "I wouldn't press that point if I were you, Lord Bracknell. If you do, perhaps I may ask for your versions of certain stories that I heard about you in London."

"What stories?" he returned, eagerly. "Depend upon it, there wasn't a word of truth in them. Surely you don't believe all you are told!" And so forth, and so forth.

The remainder of the colloquy was carried on in such subdued accents that the eloquence of the Rev. Simeon, who was standing very close to me and emphasizing his periods by repeated taps upon my shirt front with his forefinger, drowned it. But, indeed, I was not curious to hear more. How many times, I wonder, has that self same dialogue been conducted in identical terms since the world began, and how many times will it be repeated before the human race becomes extinct? Generally, I think, about five to ten minutes elapse before the point is reached when the lady invites unreserved confession as the preliminary to possible absolution; and then the man tells her—well, I suppose he sometimes tells her the truth, though I should imagine that that is a rare case. What Bracknell said to Hilda, after they had moved away slowly toward the open French window, through which they presently vanished, I have no idea, nor can it be of the smallest consequence. What I do know is that they were absent for the best part of an hour, and that long before the expiration of that time Jim had grown fidgety, Lady Mildred was looking anxious, Mr. Turner had fallen sound asleep, and this humble chronicler was well nigh worn out with desperate efforts to sustain a conversation which flickered and died the moment it was left alone.

At length Lord Staines returned. He had been making hay with his hair, from which I concluded that he had failed to discover any arithmetical process by which the greater can be subtracted from the less, and unless I greatly misjudged him, his inward ejaculation on seeing us was, "What! not gone yet?" But he was far too polite to utter any words to that effect, and he discoursed amiably until Bracknell and Hilda reappeared, which they did without the least symptom of embarrassment on either side. Then old Turner woke up suddenly, rubbed his hands, and said that they had had a delightful evening, but that they really mustn't keep the carriage waiting any longer; whereupon we all wished one another good night with alacrity, and the party broke up.

Jim's dog cart was at the door, and he had promised to give me a lift home; but as I was putting on my overcoat in the hall he followed me and said: "Do you mind waiting a quarter of an hour, Harry? I should like to smoke a cigar with Bracknell before we go."

Of course I replied that I didn't mind at all, and accordingly we adjourned to the smoking room, whither Lord Staines did not accompany us. I don't think I have ever met any one quite so straightforward as Jim. It never occurred to him to approach any subject by a little introductory beating about the bush, as almost all of us do. If he had anything to say to you, you might be quite certain that he would say every word of it, and lose no time about doing so either. His cigar was hardly alight before he had explained matters to Bracknell in the most unequivocal language.

"Look here, Bracknell, old chap," said he, "I don't want you to flirt with Hilda Turner. We are all friends here, so I don't mind telling you that I mean to ask her to be my wife, though I'd rather you didn't speak about it to any one else just yet."

Something in this announcement seemed to tickle Bracknell amazingly; for his mirth was so immoderate and so prolonged that Jim felt constrained at last to add: "It isn't a joke."

"Oh, yes it is, my dear boy," returned the other, still laughing; "it's a first rate joke, if you could only see it. Be advised by me, Jim, and drop that young woman like a hot potato. She's not the wife for you."

"That's as may be," rejoined Jim, quietly; "but at all events she is not the wife for you."

"I should rather think she wasn't. The wife for me is a lady with £50,000 of her own. Of course it would be desirable that she should have more, but £50,000 is the irreducible minimum; the governor has just been telling me so. By the way, do you think the fair Hilda is going to accept you?"

Jim, with a becoming blush, admitted that he was sanguine.

"Well, she may. Five thousand a year is not to be sneezed at in these hard times, and I suppose you're worth all that; aren't you?"

Jim got up and leaned with his back against the mantelpiece. "Do you know, Bracknell," said he, "I don't like that way of talking. I am sure you have no intention of hurting my feelings; but, you see, it isn't pleasant to me to hear Hilda spoken of"——

"As if she resembled other women! All right, Jim; I'll spare your feelings for the future, and I don't think I'll marry Miss Turner, thank you. I suppose I may sometimes speak to her though?"

"Of course you may," replied Jim, quite gravely. "If you tell me that you won't flirt with her, that's all I want. Only, don't you see what I mean? If you began to pay attention to Hilda, or to any other woman, what possible chance could I have? It stands to reason that I should have none. I'm neither good looking nor—nor anything. Why, I wouldn't even venture to pit myself against Harry Maynard!"

And with this homage to his friend's irresistible attraction and incidental acknowledgment of my own, Jim resumed his seat.

Bracknell was a little flattered, I think, and perhaps also (though I am not quite so sure about that) a little touched. "Go on and prosper," said he. "Marriage is the greatest mistake in the world; but if you will marry, you will. Let me know when the event comes off, and I'll be your best man."

It is not always easy to tell how far the sense of duty and honor possessed by men like Bracknell may be relied upon. Doubtless there are certain offenses against their fellow men which they would under no circumstances commit; but as for the rest, I should imagine that it was very much a question of temptation. Truth compels me to admit that the temptations with which Hilda assailed the heir of Staines Court during the next few weeks were of a nature to try the stoutest powers of resistance. I don't say that her tactics were novel; but I do say that anything more clever than her employment of them I never saw. Of course "the young people," as we were generically termed by our elders, were continually together. There were rides, there were picnics, there was lawn tennis—in short, all the ordinary amusements of country house life in the summer time; and to watch Hilda and Bracknell together on those occasions would have been most entertaining if it had not been a little distressing. She stirred his curiosity; she roused in him a spirit of emulation; she flattered his vanity one day only to wound it the next. Sometimes she ignored him as obstinately as she had done the first evening, and every now and again when Jim's back was turned, she would favor him with a look which I am quite sure must have sent a thrill through his whole person, though he had the credit of being accustomed to such looks. All this time she was charming in her demeanor to poor old Jim, with whom, however, she now avoided taking solitary walks; and the upshot of it was that, before a fortnight had passed, she had two sighing lovers at her feet instead of one. That may not have been a very wonderful exploit to accomplish, nevertheless it was accomplished with very great skill.

How matters must end was obvious enough; yet when the catastrophe (for I suppose it must be called a catastrophe) came I confess I was slightly startled. It was Mr. Turner who apprised me of it. Strolling out in the direction of Staines Court one hot morning, I came upon him just as he was hurrying through the gates, and he at once pulled up, took off his hat and began to mop his forehead. Evidently he was a prey to conflicting emotions, and, indeed, his first words were a confession that such was the case.

"My dear Harry," said he, "I am upset—completely upset. Tell me now—for you have an old head upon young shoulders—did it ever strike you that there was anything between my daughter and Lord Bracknell?"

I replied that that idea had suggested itself to me.

"You don't say so!" exclaimed Mr. Turner. "Dear me! Well, I assure you that I never was more taken aback in my life than when Lord Bracknell came to me last night to tell me that he had proposed to Hilda and had been accepted. Ah, I see that you are astonished. The fact is that I had formed other—ahem!—anticipations. Possibly you may have shared those anticipations?"

I signified assent, and he went on: "To tell you the truth, Harry, I should have been better pleased if things had fallen out otherwise. Even now I am not sure—— However, we shall see. I have just received a note from Lord Staines, requesting me to call upon him immediately, and I greatly fear that he will not be favorable to the engagement. You are very observant, I know; have you noticed any signs of his being disposed to—er—welcome dear Hilda as his daughter-in-law?"

I was quite unable to say that I had, and I really felt very sorry for the poor man, who seemed, through no fault of his own, to have got between the upper and the nether millstones. Nothing was more certain than that he was about to get into serious trouble with the patron of his living, and it might be safely predicted that, when he returned home, he would get into trouble not less serious with the controller of the household and his actions. I quite understood why he begged me not to mention this to anybody, and also who was meant by that emphatic "anybody," for a squire in the hand is worth two viscounts in the bush. I willingly gave him the required assurance, and he hastened away toward the house, fanning himself with his pocket handkerchief as he went.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.

Rheumatism and Neuralgia.—Though the former disease remorselessly attacks persons of all ages, and the latter ruthlessly selects its victims from the weak and delicate, the perseveringuse of these remedies will infallibly cure both complaints. After the affected parts have been diligently fomented with hot brine, and the skin thoroughly dried, Holloway's Ointment must be rubbed in firmly and evenly for a few minutes twice a day, and his Pills taken according to the printed directions wrapped round each box of his medicine. Both Ointment and Pills are accompanied by instructions designed for the public at large, and no invalid, who attentively reads them, can now be at any loss how to doctor himself successfully.
