THREE ETON BOYS.

BY W. E. NORRIS.

CHAPTER III.

Lord Staines was a weak man, and, like most weak men, was exceedingly peremptory when roused to anger. It was certainly not poor Mr. Turner's fault that Bracknell had been brought within an ace of making his emotions mix of himself; for, as everybody knew, Mr. Turner had no more control over his daughter than he had over the empress of China. Still, those who are invested with nominal authority should expect to be held responsible when disasters occur, and a sadpity it is that this excellent rule is not more frequently made to apply to certain high functionaries whom one might name. Lord Staines, having got hold of Hilda's ostensible superior, led the unhappy man into his study and then and there gave him a tremendous wigging. I made a point of calling upon the Rev. Simeon in the course of the afternoon, and found him quite shattered. Never in his life before, he said piteously, had such language been used to him, and although it was his duty as a Christian to forgive Lord Staines' words, he feared that it would be long before he would be able to forget him.

As for Bracknell, he was packed off by the first train with a flea in his ear, and, I dare say, a check in his pocket. He wrote a letter to Hilda, in which, I understand, he represented himself to be broken hearted, but powerless. His father wouldn't hear of the engagement, and, since he was entirely dependent upon his father, there was no more to be said. Upon reflection, I feel quite sure that he must have received a check. Lord Staines possessed a fine old fashioned temper, but he worshiped his son, whose will was a great deal stronger than his own, and if Bracknell had really been determined upon marrying the cook, I doubt not but that he would have snapped his finger in his father's face and married her. Such may not probably have been also the opinion of the fair Hilda, whose wrath at finding herself thus coolly left in the lurch was, as I gathered from her father, very great.

Her disappointment might have been easier to bear, and the whole affair might have blown over quietly, if only Lord Staines had had the sense to hold his tongue about it. But I suppose he was flushed with victory and couldn't hold his tongue. First he told Lady Mildred, which was perhaps unavoidable; later in the day, by which time he had fully recovered his good humor, he marched down to see my mother and boasted a little of the facility with which he had nipped this folly and nonsense in the bud.

"Rely upon it, my dear Mrs. Maynard," said he, "there is nothing like prompt decision and decision in these cases. People tell me that I have ever indulged Bracknell, and possibly I have; but I believe he understands pretty well that there are certain limits which he had better not transgress. I can't afford to have a pauper daughter-in-law, and there's an end of it."

My mother said it was all very worldly and shocking, and that if Lord Staines had nothing worse than lack of fortune to urge against Hilda, he ought to be ashamed of himself. However, he was not ashamed of himself, and I take it that he must have gone about freely extolling the virtue of promptitude and decision, for in a few days the whole neighborhood was in possession of the facts, together with such emendations and additions as individual taste had grafted on to them in the process of transmission. Among the first to be informed of what had occurred was Jim, who rode over to our house in a great state of heat to ask me whether I had heard what he was pleased to call "an infernal lying report." When I was obliged to tell him that the report alluded to, however infernal it might be, was substantially correct, I really thought for a moment he was going to hit me between the eyes. But he renounced that intention, if he had ever entertained it, and only dropped into a chair, with a look of pain and reproach on his face which hurt me almost as much as if I had deserved it.

"And you knew that Bracknell was humbugging me all this time?" he exclaimed.

I had not said so, but the fact was undeniable. I fancy that, upon the first blush of the thing, he was more grieved by Bracknell's treachery than by Hilda's inconstancy, and I could not get him to pay much attention to the excuse which I made both for the culprit and for myself; though I venture to think that these were neither intrinsically poor nor badly put. But when, in the plentitude of my generosity, I began to make excuses for Hilda too, he stopped me at once—

"That's enough, Harry," he interrupted. "You mean well, but you don't seem to see that apologizing on Hilda's behalf is implying that she is to blame. I can't admit that for an instant. She never gave me anything in the shape of a promise; and if I chose to imagine that she cared for me, the more fool I."

"Well, perhaps so," I agreed. "Anyhow, it's very evident that she did not care for you."

"Yes," he replied, sighing; "that's evident, I suppose. And yet I can't help thinking that she might have cared for me if Bracknell hadn't come down. But there's no good in talking about that now. I shall be off somewhere for the next few months, I think. You couldn't be persuaded to come with me to Switzerland, and perhaps spend the winter in Italy, could you?"

I reminded him that I was not a man of independent fortune, and that my winter would have to be spent in the less agreeable atmosphere of Lincoln's inn, where I had already taken chambers; but I strongly advised him to go away and travel. He had so many friends that he was not likely to be left long without a companion. I fear that he did not find me very sympathetic; and in truth it was all I could do to restrain myself from openly congratulating him upon his escape.

Presently he said that if my mother was well enough to receive him, he would just go and say good morning to her, and I knew better than to accompany him to her room. From that quarter those who were afflicted in mind, body or estate could always count upon obtaining sympathy, if not comfort; and sure enough, when Jim emerged, after an interview of half an hour, he looked so much less inclined to hang himself that I was afraid my mother had committed the imprudence of advising him to try again. But that, it appeared, was a groundless alarm.

"Oh, no," he said, quietly, in answer to my inquiry, "she didn't give me any hope. She was awfully kind, though, and I believe it's quite true that I shall get over this some day. Only I wish Bracknell had been a little more straight about it."

Well, upon the whole, that seemed to be a very proper spirit in which to meet adversity, and I accompanied my friend down stairs, hoping that, after all, he might not be quite as hard hit as I had supposed. But when we reached the front door, whom should we find talking affably to the groom and caressing Jim's horse but Miss Hilda Turner in person!

Jim started violently, while I, for my part, inwardly commended her to the devil; for I could not doubt her purpose in waiting outside in that unseemly way.

"Why did you not come in?" I asked, with a touch of asperity. "I presume you called to see my mother, didn't you?"

"I did," she replied calmly, and never to such a degree changed color; "but when I saw Jim's horse at the door, I thought I would wait for him and call on Mrs. Maynard some other day. I know it tires her to have more than one visitor at a time. Jim, if you have nothing better to do, you might walk home with me."

"Good heavens!" thought I to myself, "is she going to propose to him?" I took the liberty of raising my eyebrows ostentatiously, but I doubt whether any evolutions which I could have induced my eyebrows to perform would have disturbed her equanimity. She met my gaze with perfect composure, and it was I, not she, who had to look the other way.

The countenance of that foolish Jim expressed mingled surprise, pleasure, and doubt. What was the good of my giving him a surreptitious dig in the back and making grimaces at him when he turned around? Hilda had but to beckon him and he would have gone with her to the world's end. He went with her unhesitatingly to the end of our short avenue, leading his horse; and there they were lost to my gaze. But it was not necessary to be gifted with second sight in order to feel tolerably sure of what was taking place between them after they had vanished; and I returned to the study of the law with misgivings which were only too soon to be justified. An hour or so later, while I was immersed in pleadings, and was cumbering my brain with the absurd jargon of replications, rejoinders, surrejoinders, rebutters, and the like, I heard somebody ride full gallop up to the house, immediately after which my door was burst open, as by a charge of dynamite, and Jim, victorious and triumphant, stood before me once more. One glance at his face was sufficient to show me that it was all up with him.

"You needn't go into ecstasies," I said snappishly; "I know all about it."

"Now, my dear Harry," he remonstrated, "how can you possibly know all about it?"

"At least," said I, "I know that you are engaged to Hilda Turner."

He gave me to understand in reply that such was indeed his good fortune. "And do you know," he continued, "the truth is—it's so glorious that I can hardly believe it, and yet I feel somehow as if I had always been sure of it—the truth is that she has loved me all along!"

"Then," I could not help remarking, "she took the very oldest way of showing her affection that I ever heard of."

Jim said, "No! at all odd; the same kind of thing has often happened before, as everybody knows... It all arose out of my stupid bashfulness. She naturally thought that I couldn't care much about her, since I wouldn't speak out, and so when Bracknell made his offer she accepted him. She says she would have accepted anybody under the circumstances—and I can quite understand it."

Obviously reasoning would be thrown away upon such a lunatic; nevertheless, to set myself straight with my conscience, I endeavored to reason with him.

"It appears, then," said I, "that she sought you out in order to avow her love. If she was not too proud to do that today, why in the world couldn't she have done it a few weeks ago?"

"Good Lord!" ejaculated Jim, "what a low opinion you have of your fellow creatures! Sought me out indeed! Why, my dear fellow, you wouldn't believe what trouble I had to extort the truth from her. What she sought me out for—not that she did seek me out—was to beg me to try and make peace between her father and old Staines. That, of course, led us to speak about Bracknell, and then I couldn't help telling her how long I had loved her, and then at last she admitted that she had only promised to marry him out of pique. But she was very unwilling to accept me, I can tell you. Harry, old chap, you don't know Hilda; she's the sweetest girl in England!"

If she was, I certainly did not know her; but to make such a rejoinder as that would only have been to expose myself to a surrejoinder which it would have been altogether futile to attempt to rebut; so I said what was expected of me with as good a grace as I could command, and as soon as Jim was gone I kicked those odious law books to the other end of the room, in token alike of my abhorrence for them individually, and of my disgust with a state of things which I was powerless to remedy.

CHAPTER IV.

The young couple were, to all appearance, thoroughly satisfied with one another, and their satisfaction was very commonly, if not quite universally, shared by their friends and relatives. Old Turner rubbed his plump white hands, and declared that the wish of his heart was now fulfilled; Lord Staines was so delighted that he could not rest until he had walked over to the rectory and announced his delight; and my mother, though secretly a little disappointed (for Jim was a great favorite of hers), did not hesitate to aver that all was for the best. It is true that she would have said and thought the self same thing if she had just heard me sentenced to be hanged by the neck until I was dead—such being her simple creed. Taking her stand upon certain passages of Scripture, she boldly asserted that it was not for us to judge whether this or that event would be productive of ultimate good or not, and, in short, adopted without reservation the doctrine that whatever is is right.

To fall in with my dear mother's views in this respect has never been possible to me, and amid the general chorus of approval I found some comfort in listening to a dissenting voice which harmonized with my own. It was a very quiet little voice, but it was a sweet one, and was seldom used to utter disparaging remarks about anybody. "Since you ask me," Lady Mildred said, "I am not glad, I am sorry. It seems to me that Hilda is not good enough for Mr. Leigh."

"That," I observed, "is beyond all question."

"Yes; and I don't understand her changing her mind so quickly. Of course it was impossible that Bracknell should marry her; but if it had been possible they might have got on together well enough, perhaps. I am fonder of Bracknell than of anybody else in the world, and I don't know that she is exactly good enough for him either. But he is different from Mr. Leigh. I mean that if he had found out afterward that Hilda was not quite—quite what he had fancied her, I don't think he would have taken it so much to heart."

These were precisely my sentiments; but as no one had the remotest intention of consulting either me or Lady Mildred, we could not do better than keep them to ourselves, and we kept them to ourselves accordingly.

Of Bracknell I heard nothing, nor, I suppose, did Jim receive congratulations from that quarter, although I did not like to ask him the question. No doubt he had forgiven his old friend, as he could well afford to do, being more or less in the position of a conquerer. His marriage was appointed to take place in the ensuing month of January, and soon after hearing of this arrangement I left home to be formally called to the bar and to take possession of my chambers, where, I am thankful to say, that my legal library has remained unconsulted from that day to this. For then it was that I received my first substantial encouragement to persevere with those literary labors which have since made life pleasant to me, and have even enabled me to afford an occasional pat of butter with my bread.

A few days before Christmas I seated myself in the down express from Paddington, being bound for Cranfield, with the twofold object of spending that festive season at home and assisting at Jim's subsequent nuptials. Just as the train was starting a young man of fashionable exterior jumped into the carriage, tumbled over my legs, apologized, and then said, "Oh, it's you, Maynard, is it? Going down to the old shop?"

I replied that such was my destination, but that I presumed it wasn't his—not that I really presumed anything of the kind, but because I thought that, taking everything into consideration, Bracknell would have shown better taste by remaining absent from the paternal abode at that particular juncture.

"Oh, yes, I'm going to Staines Court," he returned. "Why shouldn't I?"

"If you don't know, I'm sure I don't," I answered.

"My dear fellow," said Bracknell, lighting a cigar, "if you were to be bound to avoid every woman with whom you have ever been in love, your life would be a perpetual game of hide and seek. In fact, the thing really couldn't be done. How is that dear old duffer Jim getting on? Lord, what an existence he has before him! It was a bad day for him when the governor refused to let me take Miss Hilda off his hands. That girl will end by breaking his heart, you'll see."

MORSE'S GLYCEROLE OF CELERY COMPOUND.

New Remedy for Teething Infants & Adults suffering from Nervous Diseases, &c.

(CONTAINING NO OPIUM.)

Celery Compound is a safe and pleasant substitute or opium and other powerful drugs, leaving no bad after-effects; in fact, acting as a tonic, building up the system

See following letter we publish by permission of Mr. Morse.

INFANT'S HOME AND INFIRMARY, TORONTO, 29th December, 1886.

HIRAM MORSE, Esq.

Dear Sir:—I must thank you for the bottles of Celery Compound. I have used it especially with the teething infants, and have found it a certain remedy for feverishness and every form of indigestion, and for the weak and sickly ones it was invaluable as a tonic, and I shall have the greatest pleasure in recommending its use to everyone. Wishing you every success, I beg to remain,

Yours very respectfully, M. WHITE, Head Nurse.

We recommend Celery Compound. Every mother should have a bottle in the house.

Signed, W. J. WILSON.

IMPORTANT TO ALL

Who are Bald, or have Thin or Grey Hair, or who are troubled with DANDRUFF.

DR DORENWEND'S

HAIR MAGIC!

Will be found invaluable for the hair and scalp. It cleanses the scalp of all Dandruff, invigorates the growth of the hair, and in cases of baldness where there are the slightest signs of roots left it will produce good crops of hair. It restores grey hair to its original color, and is an excellent dressing.

Do not delay! If your hair is in a weak condition, get a bottle at once.

For sale by J. G. King & Co., A. P. Chown and all druggists. Ask for it.

A GOOD CUP OF TEA,

Ask for and drink only

REDDEN'S

CHINESE MIXTURE.

Drink it alone, it is pure, and therefore cheap. It is much stronger than any other tea in the same quantity must not be used—two teaspoonfuls will go as far as three of other sorts, therefore it is much more economical.
