THURSDAY EVENING, MARCH 22.

The Emperor of Japan has announced his intention of convoking a Parliament to meet in 1890, and, in the meantime, he has adopted all the novel plan of sending young men to various countries of the civilized world to learn their business. Should one go to Toronto, he might bring back to Japan the invaluable knowledge of how to cultivate the growth and interests of the country upon Apollinaris water and corkscrews.

The Ottawa Herald says "the excursion of Members Parliament and press representatives, tives to Kingston on Saturday was very successful and enjoyable. The hospitality of the Kingstonians was unbounded and all the visitors express themselves as delighted with what they saw, in and about the military school, and the Penitentiary. The result of the visit to the school cannot fail to strengthen it as an institution of the country."

Mr Forster's address in Ireland, assuring the people that while the Government was determined to maintain its authority it was anxious and desirous of improving their condition as far as consistent with the rights of property and demands of justice, has produced a favourable effect, and has strengthened the position of the Government greatly. The result has been aided still further by the courage of "dook-shot Forster" in attacking agitators and midnight marauders in the very home of disaffection.

The penetrating editor of the Toronto Telegram pronounces his opinion of the recent grant of a number of acres of land by Parliament to Kingston, as follows: "The fact that the Minister of Militia sees that something has to be done to popularize the institution (the R.M.C.), if only by giving the visiting members of Parliament a lunch, is an admission that the institution is rapidly falling into disfavor." The trip was arranged for the purpose of enabling the members to inspect the Military College with their own eyes, so that they would be independent of vague report and ignorant newspaper talk. There was no public or moral reason why they should be starved while here, although the Telegram appears to be under the impression that such was the case.

Sir A. T. Galt, no doubt, surprised his aristocratic audience at Willis' Rooms, London, when he explained to them the magnitude of our fisheries and the magnitude of the bogus bounties paid them. The early greatness of England, he observed, sprang in a large measure from the fisheries, which furnished her with a hardy race, the foundation of her naval strength. It is to be presumed, therefore, that if our fisheries are cherished sufficiently we may be able to produce a crew for the Charybdis. Apart from this jest, however, it is significant and worthy of note that four thousand miles of coast are open for Canadian fishermen, and that although the United States have ten times our population, yet our shipping almost equals theirs in extent. Certainly, the development of our fisheries should prove "the readiest means to individual strength as a part of the empire."

France continues to regard her old colony of Quebec with an affectionate consideration, and to demonstrate the existence of this sentiment in various ways. The last little incident significant of such an attachment is the conferment of the rank of Chevalier of the Legion of Honour upon Mr C. O. Perreault, of Montreal, Vice Consul General of the French Republic, in token of her appreciation of the services rendered by M. Perrault to French immigrants and French sufferers, and also his efforts in promoting intercourse between France and Canada. Of course the golden cross is scarcely to be prized as highly as the laureate crown won by Frechette on his marriage as a poet, still it is a mark of distinction of which the recipient may well be proud. If he failed in this feeling, his friends certainly did not, judging from the speeches made at a complimentary banquet tendered to the Chevalier on Tuesday evening.

With strange want of discernment the Grit press neglected to publish Mr Anglin's speech on the budget very fully, so the explanation was moved to procure the invaluable utterance from perishing with the ephemeral productions of "an earthy to-day" by printing it in full in his own paper, the St. John Freeman. In the course of his remarks he said that the populations of Montreal, Quebec, St. John, and Moncton had increased under National Policy. But he did not explain where the nutbrown from
