What the Queen had to do With That Hand.

The Judge was a Christian and played on the square, but he figured the cards pretty close; he could call off your hand every time he a pair, and could lay down a full when he chose. The Colonel would play a more difficult game—I don't mean to say he would cheat, but he held the big cards when the big betting came, and some hands that couldn't be beat. Coming home from Chicago the two chanced to meet: they were very old friends —on the cars, and as neither the other at poker could beat, they played euchre for points, for cigars. The cards ran along pretty evenly, too, till the Judge turned a monstrous bower, when the Colonel, to shuffling, slipped the deck through, and the Judge got a mild one instead. Two euchres, of course, but the Judge was amazed when he lifted four kings to a trump, but the Colonel, only seeming a particle fazed, turned up a red queen for a trump.

"Now say, do you pass, Judge?" the Colonel called out. "Look here, said the limb of the law, "I've mighty poor cards; if you're in for a bust, we'll play the thing out at a draw."

The Colonel considered, and wriggled his neck "I, too, have a very old hand; if you give me that queen from the top of the deck we'll play out the cards as they stand."

"Agreed," said the Judge, for now at a glance the Colonel had one of two things—a full, or four queens, and he hadn't a chance to take down the pot from four kings.

The Judge chipped with fifty, the Colonel came back with fifty and raised him fifty more, of the bets the two made I could never get track, but they piled up like gale in a storm.

At last says the Judge: Here, I'm hard up, so just lend me something as a favor to pot. "Hold on, said the Colonel, I, too, have found four, and they're four aces I'm got."

The Judge took the cards and looked over them real: Behind a bright face his heart was weathed: "Well, what I'd like to know is what's the use of throwing at only 50c.
