At one time we really did think, and said so, that these boasting Vagabonds would make some demonstration in force, upon some part of Upper Canada; but after their doings in Maine, we recant that opinion, and go back to the original idea, that all that the leaders of the Fenians want is to swindle their deluded countrymen and countrywomen out of their

LETTER FIRST.

Gauanoque, April 20th, 1866. (To the Editor of the British Whig.) For many years I have observed through the country, and especially from Prescott to the head of the Bay of Quinte, that the Orchards of Apple Trees are everywhere decaying, particularly those of long stand-Many of them are dead, others have dead branches, small and knarled fruits. Scarcely can a tree be seen on any riant state, except it be at the side of a it. Similar cases everywhere. a knowledge of these facts, with close observation, together with an experience sent day's publications.

The most important principle in the art or science of bringing the Fruit Tree to perfection, more especially in this climate, and with a luxuriant and healthy growth, and superior fruit, has never been noticed by any author, viz., 'the Virgin Soil,' which is not surprising, as all the authors who Tree, have been of that class of persons who perhaps had never known soil in its original state of nature-only having known by actual experience lands which had at some time been turned over with the plow -and this great error of bringing land into their fruit trees, has been almost universally believed as essential to success i bringing their orchards to a healthy state of perfection. The greatest pleasure a farmer can have is an orchard of healthy Fruit Trees, but the attempt has so often failed, that many have finally abandoned the trial altogether. Now my present object is to make some remarks on the soil. I have found that the Fruit Tree can only be brought to perfection on the virgio soil. Almost every farmer can find on his farm some piece of wood land where the plow has never been used, nor has the grass ever grown upon Let the wood be removed, but be extremely careful to have no fire on the surface, but leave all the rubbish, leaves, and chips on the ground to decay and decompose, as decomposed vegetation is the best food for the growth of the tree. Then without any delay set your trees, distance from each other about fourteen or fifteen feet apart each way. Then see carefully to the fence, that it may be made perfectly secure against all cattle whatever. Horses and pigs alone may possibly be allowed to enter. Good, healthy grafted trees should when in the nursery. Thus can a piece of land for an orchard perfectly clear from the trees for about five or six feet, which can be done, and must be done twice in the year, by the hoe. After eight or ten years this may be dispensed with, if thought too much trouble years, they require to be closely but judicionaly pruned, being careful not to cut off any main or leading branches, nor any so large as not to heal easily over, nor to use

Land in a perfect state of nature is never to be disturbed for a single instance b cultivation, or the plow to enter it, then it wil forever retain its bright porous nature, and the trees will grow most luxuriantly bearing a fair, large and plentiful supply of fruit. But after the land has once been plow'd

The reason is obvious - the Virgin Soi until it is turned over by the plow or the. spade, is light and porous as an honeycomb, and will remain so for centuries undisturbed. The trees in such soil will luxuriance which in cultivated ground all tivated it grows harder and less congenia! may be attributed the many failures of our farmers, in their endeavors to plant
