A Story Written for Holiday Season.

Love Does Not Run Smooth Always, But it Will Triumph in the End.

Written by Fidelis.

"Where are you going, Edwin?" The question was addressed to a young man with a bright, pleasant face, looking just then brighter and pleasanter than usual, as, with a bit of geranium in his botton hole he entered a luxurious library, in which the soft warm glow of a wood-fire blended with the yellow twilight of a September sun-set. I am going out for the evening mother, he replied, with a slightly conscious air. Oh! I suppose I can guess where

But don't you know that I expect Kate Longley and her visitors in to-night?" "Yes; but this was a previous engagement, and Miss Longley is coming to see you, not me. I shall not be much missed, and perhaps I shall be home before they leave.' A cloud had been gathering on Mrs. Carter's handsome but haughty face, and "I think it's time we understood each other, Edwin. I've told you repeatedly that ing mood. Besssie Stuart would never suit you for a wife, or me for a daughter." "As to the first, mother, I am the best judge. As to the second, I am very sorry that you feel so but I venture to think you are mistaken."

"I generally know my own mind, Edwin. And it is intolerable to me that you should throw away your chance of winning a girl like Miss Longley for the sake of that palefaced, insignificant little governess?"

"Mother ." the young man exclaimed,his cheek flushing hotly,-"Remember you are speaking of my betrothed wife."

"I shall remember no such thing! What can you see in that girl to think of her for a moment beside Kate Longley, so handsome and clever, and with a fortune that-"

Edwin's face had lost its flush, and grown pale with anger and annoyance. He had no Henry Irving's favorite color is crimson, answer to give to the question. True love and for this reason in the costuming of has no reason to give-but love. But all the more sharply he interrupted his mother: "I'd rather be excused hearing Miss Longley's advantages catalogued as if a wife were something to be bought, like a horse have no reason to suppose she would have me, if I wanted her, and I don't think it's fair—either to her or to me!"

Mrs. Carter's imperious face grew paler and harder. "This thing is too much," she said. "There must be an end of it. I have told you that I should never give my consent to your engagement. I'm not going to have my son running after anybody's governess. Either you will give up this girl, or you will give up your mother. If you persist in going out to-night, you can look out for yourself hereafter."

"Mother!" the young man exclaimed, looking stunned.

"Yes, I mean it! You have had everyyour own way you can go, without any and escaped. further help from me!"

Though he had had every advantage of education and travel she had always discouraged his thinking of a profession, as of a drudgery he had no need to undergo-she would say-as her own fortune would eventually be his, though for the present it was all in her own power, and Edwin had nothing but what he receiv. ed from her. But of this he was scarcely conscious, in the atmosphere of luxury that had always surrounded him, and he had no expensive tastes. His own bent was rather towards a literary career, and his mother was not unwilling to see him occupied with a little amateur work of that kind-not hitherto, very successful—as she thought it might be of service to him, should he go into politics, as she hoped he might in a mild way. The first serious conflict between mother and son, had arisen in regard to poor little Bessie Stuart, whom she did not think in any respect "good enough" for her son, though her chief and most tangible objection was, that the girl was in what she was pleased to term a "dependent | back ache, biliousness or humors of the blood position," though the truth was, that being | try Burdock Blood Bitters. It is a guaranleft penniless, she had been too independent | teed cure for all irregularities of blood, liver to live on her relations, and was endeavoring to earn her own living and help her invalid mother by the honorable work of teaching children. To Mrs. Carter's convention al and vulgar pride it was gall and wormwood to think of her son frequenting the house of any of her acquaintances-in order to visit "the governess," which possibly the lady with whom Miss Stuart lived divined and rather enjoyed. At all events being one ef the few who knew how to treat the teacher of their children with proper consideration, and being really fond of Bessie, she willingly afforded the lovers all reasonable facilities for meeting and enjoying together, in a walk or a row, the pleasant summer evenings. But Mrs. Carter's vexation at her son's engagement proceeded not only from a negative objection to his betrothed. Ever since Mr. Longley and his charming daughter-an heiress like herself-had come to heart on having the handsome and fascinating girl for a daughter-in-law. During the past summer, especially, she had tried every means within her power to bring her boy into captivity to Kate's charms, usually so all-powerful. During Miss Stuart's vacation and absence, she had been particularly hopeful of success, but her efforts seemed only to have precipitated, soon after Bessie's return the engagement which she had indignantly and utterly refused to recognize or sanction. She would not receive the girl into her house and she her over by degrees, reluctantly agreed. With an unfeeling callousness to poor Bessie's feelings, which only pride could have produced, his mother still hoped to wean his affection from his finance,e to the girl who, in her eyes, was so infinitely more attractive. Certainly poor Bessie could not, as she thought, compare with Kate either as to beauty or animation; and it was not so surprising that her unsympathetic nature could not divine the charm which had won Edwin's heart—the gentle sympathy and tenderness of the girl's nature which seemed to supply to him the lack he had always felt in that of his mother. As for Miss Longley, she was too clear-sighted not to penetrate Mrs. Carter's match-making scheme and she also divided the real state of the case with regard to Bessie, to whom she had taken one of her strong fancies. She liked Edwin too, and might easily have found it in her heart to like him as well as his mother desired. But though his stoical indifference to her own charms piqued her as an unaccustomed experience she was far too loyal and high spirited to have the slightest desire to interfere with his allegiance to his betrothed. When, shortly after the scene with which our story begins, she arrived with some young guests and satellites in Mrs. Carter's drawing-room, she accepted in her most gracious manner that lady's rather conscious apologies for her son's absence. Miss Longley easily divided the cause, and brought all her powers of pleasing into requisition in order to remove the cloud on her hostess brow. She partially succeeded, indeed, in making Mrs. Carter forget her annoyance, though she could not but wish all the more that Edwin had been present to see Miss Longley in her happiest and most charm
