A STATUE FOR LOGAN.

WHERE CAN A SUITABLE SITE BE HAD IN WASHINGTON?

The Available Places Almost All Taken Up-Equestrian Statues of McPherson and Greene-"The Horse Pasture"-Bad Views Obtained from the Galleries.

[Special Correspondence.] WASHINGTON, Jan. 18.—It will not be long before something is done toward erecting a statue to Gen. Logan. While the Grand Army of the Republic or the Army of the Tennessee may choose to place a statue or monument of the general at his grave in Chicago, congress will undoubtedly appropriate the necessary means to erect an equestrian statue of the great volunteer general at the capital, where as soldier and legislator his fame centers. Here, too, is to be Mrs. Logan's home, and here for nearly half of the general's life he lived and worked. There will be difficulty in finding a suitable spot for such a statue, as those of Washington, Jackson, Scott, McPherson, Farragut, Dupont and Thomas now occupy the most prominent sites. There remains, however, Iowa circle, where it was once designed to place a statue of Gen. Grant, and for a time it was called Grant circle. Gen. Logan lived last year, before he bought the Stone mansion, on Iowa circle. Mrs. Logan prefers this spot, if any is to be honored with a statue to the general.

M'PHERSON'S STATUE.

One of the best equestrian statues in Washington is that of Gen. Logan's comrade, Mc-Pherson, whom he succeeded temporarily in July, 1864, when McPherson was killed at Atlanta. It is a lifelike counterpart of Gen. McPherson, and in pose, action and expression is above criticism. This statue stands in McPherson square where Vermont avenue intersects I and K streets. Looking out on this square are some notable houses, among them the Hamilton Fish mansion, Chamberlain club house, and Senator Palmer's new house, with its massive brown stone front and kitchen on the top floor. The statue is of bronze and was designed by Louis T. Robisso, of Cincinnati, in 1875. Robert Wood & Co., of Philadelphia, cast it, as they have most of the bronze figures in Washington, among them those of Gen. Scott, Gen. Rawlins and Gen. Greene. When the McPherson statue was unveiled in 1876 Gen. Logan was the orator of the day, and his feeling tribute to his old comrade is one of the best speeches of his life. The McPherson statue cost $23,000, while the pedestal, which is of New England granite, cost $35,000. The Society of the Army of the Tennessee erected both statue and pedestal. It was at first proposed to place the remains of Gen. McPherson beteath the statue but his family objected, and he was permitted to lie in the soil of his native state. It is a serious drawback to the enjoyment of this work of art that it stands in a small park containing about an acre of land and is densely surrounded by large trees. It has not the prominence which the Farragut or Dupont statues have in their parks, nor that which the Scott and Thomas have in small circles of grass plot at the intersection of prominent streets and avenues. A sparrow has a nest in the stirrup of Mc-Pherson's right foot, and for two years past has hatched her young there.

One of the most interesting equestrian statues in Washington is that of Gen. Greene, which few people ever saw. It stands in Greene square, a bare piece of ground embracing three and a half acres of land just north and east of the

THE GRZENE STATUE.

Capitol. It is of bronze, weighs three tons, and cost the government $50,000, the statue alone costing $40,000. The sculptor was H. K. Brown, who died the other day. He also made the statue of Gen. Scott in Scott circle, the ill fated locality where several statesmen built fine houses only to be sent back to private life by their constituencies. It is here Mr. Blaine lived in Secretary Windom's house. Here Mr. Robeson had a fine house, and Don Cameron's old house stands neighbor to it. Minister Pendleton's house, now occupied by Secretary Endicott, is near Scott circle. The statue of Gen. Greene is Brown's best work. It is said to be the best revolutionary likeness yet made. It was provided for by a resolution in the Continental congress, but nothing was ever done about it until Senator Anthony, of Rhode Island, revived interest in the greatest soldier of his little state, in 1876, and Brown was commissioned to design the statue. It is supposed that the Continental congress had no money to pay for Greene's statue, and with the usual neglect of republics, Greene went unhonored in sculpture until a century after the struggle in which he achieved fame began. The idea of action is pre-eminent in this work. The left hind foot of the horse rests on a cannon ball and the general has his right arm outlifted before him in the act of leading a body of troops forward to attack. The uniform is Continental and sits gracefully on the firm, athletic figure. It is a wonderfully hundsome, alert face, and form, and to patriode Americans the statue should ever be an object of delight, especially so from the fact that the last resting place of the Rhode Island general is unknown.

It is a curious fact in art that Brown, in modeling the equestrian statue of Gen. Scott, took for his ideal of a horse a fine Kentuckymare owned by one of his friends, and all the Washington horsemen declare it is the best horse in all the equestrian statuary in Washington, and there are so many bronze horses here that Massachusetts avenue, above Fourteenth street, is frequently called the "horse pasture."

It is a pity that the galleries of the house and senate do not give visitors a chance to see senators and members to advantage. Aside from the press galleries and those reserved for friends of members and senators and for the diplomats, there is no place where a good front view can be had of the actors in the daily scenes of debate and legislation. Here, for instance, is the usual view the gentlemen who visit the house get of one of the leaders on the Republican side-Tom Reed, of Maine. Reed is a big Newfoundland dog in general appearance and manner, save that he is not so shaggy and hairy as he should be to make the metaphor precise. He rolls in his gait and flounders about up and down the aisles during a debate very much as a big, good natured dog might. When things look a little suspicious he opens his mouth and then the likeness ceases. Instead of the deep voiced, round toned utterance you might expect from his girth and height, there comes forth from the top of his throat a thin, drawling Yankee speech that excites laughter, until you listen closely and notice that what Reed says is cutting into his opponents right and left like a Damascus blade. His logic, wit, repartee and timeliness are dreaded by everybody who is not of his political household. As he sits in his seat, back under the gallery, he sinks his head down into his fat shoulders and rests like a dog asleep in the sun until some queer state of things again rouses him up and he goes wagging and rolling down the aisle to terrify the enemy The most notable figure on the Democratic side of the house sits with his back always toward the ladies' gallery. No matter how much time he may have for it, Mr. Randall never once faces that serried mass of beauty and grace. The back of his head, just beginning to get bald, with his back hair still raven black, is all that can be seen from that quarter. There is of course much craning of necks to see the handsome, finely delineated countenance of the great protectionist Democrat, but it is only when he goes over to the Republican side and returns to his seat from the front part of the chamber that those lustrous black eyes and that firmly shut mouth can be seen fairly and fully. Mr. Randail keeps his seat when he is in the house. Few errands there cause him to move about. But most of his time is spent in the appropriations committee room, where he holds all the threads of legislation in that close grip which makes him a power-p-rhaps the greatest power in congress. J. H. TRUESDELL.

REED, OF MAINE.
