THE ST. THOMAS HORROR

SCENES AT THE FIRE AS PAINTED BY THE PASSENGERS.

Women and Children Unable to Get Out of the Cars and Suffering a Fearful Death -Investigation Into the Cause of the Disaster-One Accident Leading to Another,

LONDON, July 18.—Mr. George Jeffrey, with Mrs. Jeffrey and three children, were on the ill-fated St. Thomas excursion train, and occupied seats close to the unfortunate Baynes family. On the opposite side of the car from where they sat where three women two children and a man, who Mr. Jeffrey is convinced were burned to death. When the crash came the forward end of the car dropped down, and almost before the train stopped the entire car was in a blaze. The Bayneses and the persons referred to by Mr. Jeffrey slid down the incline to the forward end of the car where the blaze was fiercest. There was no possibility of escape by the door. The car was one of the rough excursion class, with small windows, and by these narrow openings the fantic inmates struggled to escape from their fiery prison. The sight was truly awful. At the forward end of the car a party of women and girls had been thrown together in a heap by the shock, and were endeavoring to tear off their burning clothing, while the flames licked their faces and set their hair in a blaze their frantic screams for help mingling with the crackling of the fast-consuming woodwork around them. Mrs. Jeffrey helped the little Baynes boy out of the windowthe only one of that family on board who escaped-and then threw herself out. How she managed to get through the narrow opening is a mystery to herself. Mr. Jeffrey's eldest daughter in trying to escape became wedged fast in the window and could move neither way, when someone from the outside pulled her through. Miss Jeffrey was badly burned about her hands and limbs. Mr. Jeffrey, after getting out his own children, assisted the two little daughters of Mr. Stokes, of London west, and a number of others whose lives were saved, sustaining some slight injuries himself. He states that before the train left the Port he saw somebody, whom he supposed to be a railway man, go up to Engineer Donnelly, who was then in his cab, and warned him "to be careful, very careful." Donnelly's manner left the impression on Mr. Jeffrey's mind that he had been drinking, although, of course, that impression might have been groundless.

The Official's Opinion.

Assistant General Manager Stiff visited St. Thomas to view the scene of the terrible disaster. After making the inspection and gaining as much information as possible he said that it was clearly apparent that both semaphores were closed against the excursion train, and why the engine passed the first signal was a fact that died with Harry Donnelly.

In regard to those injured the number keeps on increasing. Every other or third man met in St. Thomas seems to wear some mark of the explosion in the way of plasters, bandages, slings, etc.

During the search for bodies large gangs of men, with spades and crow bars, carefully moved charred rafters and red hot irons. As each spadeful was turned over pale faces watched intently what it contained. Pieces of charred flesh, bones, dresses, spoons, and other horrible traces of the tragedy were turned up. A stream of water was steadily thrown upon the mass, until the blackened frames and wheels began to show. A few moments afterward, the dreadful whisper went around the crowd, "They can see peoin the ruins." One by one the charred limbs of the victims of the fire and wreck were pulled from the debris, until, in a ghastly pile, they lay upon a few boards, hastily collected, a strong and fearful odor prevail-

A Series of Disasters.

The disaster at St. Thomas brought in its train a remarkable series of accidents. The collision first killed several people and broke an oil tank. The burning oil set fire to two cars and burged up several more persons. The heat from the burning cars caused an oil tank to explode, killing and burning many others. The explosion frightened a team of horses and they ran away, killed a woman and hurt several people. The blazing oil set fire to a number of buildings and a child was burned to death. The late excursion train from Port Stanley was delayed four hours by the blockade, and a young lady, waiting for it fell off the pier at Port Stanley, in the dark and was drowned. Thus the first crash was responsible for all that followed, down to the last life lost at Port

Notes and Comments.

On the way from the grounds Ryan said he didn't care for the fine. Anson said he didn't want it talked about. Ryan kept on talking and Anson kept on increasing the fine until it reached $100, when

Mr. Ryan became silent. The Port Hopes are in the city to-day. The club is managed by J. McKee, and is on a tour to the east, their programe e being thus: Monday, Belleville; Tuesday, Kingston; Wednesday, no game; Thursday, Ogdensburg; Friday, Park Nine, Kingston; Saturday, Ottawa. The team is composed of the following: Livingston, McNicholl, Murphy, Edmunds (Robt.), Hamly, Wilcox, Edmunds (Arch.), Hansman and Thompson. Livingston and Wilcox are from Bowmanville, and formerly played with the Old Oaks of that town. The battery, Mc-Nicholl and Murphy, is from Hamilton. Two years ago Livingston engaged with the Hamilton league team, but manager McKee says he never played third base with it. The match in Belleville yesterday was disastrous for the Port Hopes. A WOMAN'S CLOSE ESCAPE FROM A TERRIBLE DEATH.

Supposed to be Dead She is Taken to a Crematory, and, When Just About to be Swung Into the White-Heated Oven. Awakes--The Embarrassments of Her Attendants.

NEW YORK, July 18 .- A living woman for whom the crematory furnace was at its fierciest heat of 2,700° Farenheit, and for whom the alum sheet was already prepared. is with her husband and children, although on Thursday last she lay in her coffin in a room adjoining the yault where incineration is done. Mount Olivet crematory, in the form of a Grecian temple, is located at Fresh Pond, L.I., and Dr. Hughes, connected with it, vouches for the correctness of the story, but withholds both the name of the physician who signed the death certificate and that of the lady for the present.

On the day mentioned a casket containing the body of a woman arrived at the crematory. Accompanying it were the widower, children and a half-dozen relatives. The casket was carried into the reception room, and by its side was placed a costly silver urn, in which the ashes were to be subsequently placed for final keeping. After a simple service the lid of the coffin was removed, and the mourners, one by one, took a last tearful look. The lid was replaced, and the floral emblems again placed on the coffin. The widower and weeping children were led away to the carriages, and the dead was left to the crematory assistants for incineration. When they were gone men removed the entire lid, and went about preparing the alum sheet for enveloping the body and swinging the chilled steel cradle into position before the glowing furnace doors. While they were absent, Dr. Hughes turned to a small mirror, and, while arranging his tie, was startled by a faint voice at his back saving : "Where am I ?"

Turning quickly he saw the woman sitting bolt upright in her casket, staring directly at him. When he gathered his scattered wits he realized that prompt action was needed, and stepping to her side he said familiarly: "You are with friends." She had already swung her legs out of the casket, and was looking in a dazed way at the urn and then at her satin burial robes. Assisting her out of the dreadful coffin and encircling her with one arm, he carefully kept her head turned from her resting place, and half led, half carried her to a cheerful bedroom overhead, occupied by the superintendent and his wife. Soft breezes were coming in the window, and a cheery canary bird in an alcove sung a song of joy. While the superintendent's wife removed the garments of death and put the lady to bed. Dr. Hughes hurried away and returned with some brandy and milk. The drink had the effect of bringing a flush to the cheeks of the patient, succeeded immediately by a quiet doze. The telegraph was brought into requisition, and the husband was soon back at the crematory with a set of his wife's apparel. While he was yet on his way his wife awakened from her nap and asked: "Whose clothes am I wearing?" They were those of the crematory, but that fact was ingeniously concealed in the reply, which seemed to satisfy her. The severest task was when the husband arrived, when they tried to school him into self-control for the interview. The course of procedure agreed upon was carried out to the letter. The husband went into the room with the usual inquiry as to how she felt, and said that, if she considered herself strong enough they would return to the city, that, in hisopinion, she had stayed long enough in the Acquiessing in everything, although somewhat mystified, she arose, dressed herself, and announced that she was ready. The husband was now in a tortured frame of mind, for he dreaded passing the front door, where in large letters was the word "Crema tory." The shock of the discovery he feared would kill his wife. Happily there was a rear door, and through this he led her to a close carriage, and thence regardless of the fact that there was no road, he had the carriage driven straight acress the lawn and field until kindly trees hid the crematory from sight. Then he took the smooth pike to the nearest railroad station, and a train
