The Cuban Insurrection.

THE POSITION OF THE INSURGENTS. The last advices from Havana bring intelligence or a pitched buttle between 8,000 insurgents under the Marcuis de Saula Lucia, and about 1,800 of zers, under the Count de Valmesada. Valmesada left Puerto Principe with the Spanish troops under his command, with the idea of clearing the railway to Nuev.t. TURDAY (This way), at halfas of all the enemy who encamped on that ine. On his second days march, when within three miles of the village of Las Minas, the enemy were found occupying a strong position in his front, and these he at unce attacked. It appears that darkness put an end to the fight, but in the morning the Count abandoned his line of march as carried his troops to Baga, a point on Nuevitas Bay at which as-istance could be given him by the Spanish vessels of war, By this it would seem that the insurgents got the best of it, for they are reported as having followed the Spanish troops, harrassing their rear until their opponent had nearly reached Baga. The return of killed and wounded given in by the Spanish Commander amounts only to 40, but eyewitnesses of the battle field and other independent authorities, say that his loss must be over one hundred. down mills, larms and houses or every side. Colonel Lono has evacuated loss Tunas, the last place held by the Government in the eastern department and a rising has taken place at Santi Esperica. Macagua, Villadara and Trinidad are expected to follow; and every day seems to decrease the hopes of the Spanlards, and develop the strength and resources of the revolutionists. Dula is still at Cadiz, preparing to start with reinforcements for the Spaniards in Cuba; but his arrival there must be very speedy if it is to be of any service. The rebellion has now gained ground to the west, and is rapidly approaching the great slave populated districts. Macagoa is in the centre of these, and if a rising should take place there, nothing can save Cuba for the Spaniards. There are nearly half a million of slaves within reach of the insurgents, and if they are enrolled and armed, no effort of Spain can a ve her colony. The two iron-clads now at New Urleans are noderstood to belong to Cubans; and, with this force at sea and an overpowerit, army on shore, the revolutionists may defy
