He possesses great acuteness of mind and there is a good deal of humor often running through his public speeches. One thing, however, is remarkable, that even in his hest attempts to vindicate his course and JUST instify himself before the House, he dues not dwell so much upon his own actions and show their propriety, as he endesvors to prove the course of his opponents to be improper and wrong. He is far more viger ous in assault than in self-defence. and often when explanations are necessary he treats the House to a long tirade against the Opposition.
