Beecher on Prayer.

Prayer, the first of the second course before the Yale Theological School. "What is prayer but the conscious lift-of the Eternal God. The habit of prayer, looked at in this way, lifts the individual, izes, etheralizes the community itself, and over claimed for anything in prayer, and one of the very first things that the Christian church and minister should de would be to do what the Savier didto ch the dicip os to pray. Teach, them to pray. One of the subtle and secret arts of ministry is not didactical or demonatrative to make men pray, but by a wise knowledge of how to teach the heart, the thought, the feeling, to inspire them with the desire of some such utterance they are ethicalized to death, if they lack the Savior, the something higher, the something nobler, men will scarcely learn te pray except as a duty; but the secret of praying is wanting to pray; and the secret of wanting to pray is to have excited in our souls certain aspirations-certain desires. The conscience hungers and thirst, the imagination yearns and longs, the affections rise above all the bounds of ordinary experience in life. There is the sense of wings in every soul that is touched with the least of ideality, and it is so to preach to men that they shall have an
