Mr. Beecher's Last Sermon.

A LONGER REPORT BY MAIL. "For the former things are passed away" -Rev. xx1., 4. This was the summation, Mr. Beecher said: the particulars were given before. He would read from the first verse to It was as though the voice had said, "In this world men experience sorrow and trial. Their hopes are disappointments, their aspirations failures. which all this-the former things-shall have passed away forever." This beautiful day was a good day to talk about Heaven. There was no stir in the air, no storm on the water. All things were beautiful and still. The air was full of the flowers. It reminded one of the rest that remained for the people of Let them consider the transition by Times. which they should rise into that other state of existence. Did souls pass immeliately into blessedness after they quitted this state? Or did they lie, as the Jews believed, in a vast receptacle awaiting the last day? The New Testament was not clear on the subject, but by implication its teaching was that they rose at once to the divine presence. No allusion was made by Paul to an interval or dormant state, and yet he made constant reference never intimated that the soul took a sort UNCONSCIOUS VACATION, awaiting a general ingathering to the spiritual sphere. Nor did such an idea address itself to any human instinct which desired it to be true. Paul's doctrine was. "Absent from the body, present with the Lord." Out of this, into that. that can contribute so much to render the There was a spring of immediatism in his horse beautiful and elegant, to improve doctrine.
