Low Morals in High Life. In the celebrated Tichborne case, which is on trial in London on a charge of perjury against the claimant of the baronethis cross-examination a beautiful state of ow morals among the British aristocracy MAGAZINES cy, a Lord Bellew was a witness, and in was brought out. His lordship admitted that he had kept as his mistress for several years the wife of his friend, Captain Hervey, who consented to the arrangement, and had given his wife five pounds sterling to enable her to join his Lordship in Dublin. Lord Bellew furthermore said that he did not desert his own wife, but that her ladyship had abandoned him. If such things are possible among blue blood and aristocratic pillars of the throne, how much better are they than the ignorant brute of a hundred years age, who dragged his wife to market with a halter around her neck and sold her for half a crown and a pint of ale?
