CROQUET. How I rue the day when I played croquet That same with the traps of wire. When he fancy man's, and rolling balls, I lost my heart's desire. I'm ount by a blonde, that festive Gal Called witching Jenny Lake, Who were more stripes on her balmoral

Than shone on the painted stake.

She placed croquet with a winning way. This damsel young and fair,-With a smile so cute and a nign-heeled boot And a rose in her floating hair; Such trills of song, and such bursts of mirth. All for my own sweet sake,

Ill I tho wht a rainform touched the earth Where she stood by the painted stake. I fell in love like a turtle dove,

And cood and wood her well; ut I fell in hate at her croquet mate, And called him a cheeky swell. If he had not been, what did he mean Such a liberty to take

As to steal a kiss, and insult the miss Till she blushed like the painted stake. Ah! the game's all up, and my bitter cup La filled by a frowning fate; For at church to-day, so the papers say, She married the man I hat . For that beaming blonde in the Balmoral,

I burn at the painted stake.

THE FEARFUL LEAP HUMBUG .- Cortain newspapers have published glowing accounts of what they call a daring feat by Balleni of Niagara Falls. It is stated hat after walking across the rope he reurned to the middle of it and jumped thence into the river, 140 feet below. The jumping consists in letting himself down by a rubber rope, having great stretching capacity, until some eight or ten feet of the water, into which he then quietly drops, to be picked up by a boat stationed for the purpose.
