was Mr. Treniman, Superintendent of tion by all. the Grand Trunk Depot, who made a pointed and very practical address. He noted that by an examination of history the great men of all ages had devoted their greatest energies against the evils prevalent in the era in which they lived. He then discussed the evils of the present day, and held that drunkenness was the greatest of all, that its baneful influence was such that it affected the well-being of almost every one. He proceeded to remark that the curse did not attack certain or the common classes; it attacked the high and low, and the brightest ornament' of society as well as those whose
