FRIDAY EV'NG, APRIL 7, 1876 MY SISTER-IN-LAW.

BY THE LATE SHIRLEY BROOKS. My sister in law, they're trying again

The consanguinity table to flaw,

And Lord St. Germans declares its plain That men should marry their sisters in-law. Now what say you? for a sweeter girl Why, I might marry my sister in law When my late lamented Mrs. John Brown Invited you to reside with us.

You took up your quarters at thanden town, Without an atom of bother or fuss. You taught my children, you aired my Times You fed my wife's infernal macaw, When Sarah suffed (which was once or twice) And paid small heed to her dress or hair.

At breakfast you, with your braids so nice, Of my toast and coffee took cheerful care. And when that excellent woman gave way To what Chrimes so vulgarly called her jaw. You interposed to obtain fair play, For the scolded husband, my sister in law. If I brought home a picture or book,

And Sarah scoffed or unbraided waste A far more lady-like view you took, And praised the cheapness and praised the And when I took you both to the play. Twas a piece you liked and how well you saw

While she nagged on in a murmuring way

Unlike to yours, my sister in law ! When you gave a party, you kindly dance With any client I wished to please, Though my late lamented had hardly glanced At folks who paid me enormous fees. And then that row-and the bonnet blue And the scandal spread by old Mother Shaw, How stoutly you declared it untrue

(As indeed it was,) my sister in law.

You wrote my letters, you paid my bills, And took receipts (which you never lost. I smoked -you (wisted the nicest spills And you always knew what the coals had You saw that my slippers were near You saw that my study fire would draw, And you did it all with a cheerful air

(Not that of a martyr), my sister-in law. My promise the late lamented took. That I'd not re marry, except to you, And a wicked page in the Statute Book Is now, I hope, to be torn in two. The Commons, you know, have closed the stri No Jew tradition the Lords should awe; And you in the name of my lawful wife Shall merge the name of my sister in-law.
