We would especially commend the rigid medical examination that sach man must undergo before going into camp. Hitherto there has been entirely too little attention given to this important matter, and the consequence was men who were little better than invalids at home, were permitted to undertake the exposure and fatigue of a camplife. No wonder so many returned worse than when they of sickness and death followed. None but those with a sound constitution should be allowed to undergo the process of drilling in an exposed camp.
