But we must take a glimpse at Sir Herits destination. Though he decides the Leo shall proceed on the dangerous enterprise, no thought of malice towards Captaiu Reeves actuates him. It never enters his thought that it is a good way of getting rid of him for a while, and thus stopping the constant visits to Government House. The idea is altogether too paltry and despicable-it is beneath a man of Sir Herbert's tone of mind. He fixes on that particular ship simply being anchor in such a storm near the Short Reefs on an iron-bound coast, and rendering crew, and an able captain. All these qualifications the Leo possesses to perfection. She is a well-built handsome craft; her hardy tars are smart and well disciplined; and there is no braver officer in the British navy than Walter Reeves. True, when on shore he seems rather too fond of amusement, and has been called "conceited," "trifling," "frivolous," "danditied," and what not, by men who are jealous of him; but let his foot once touch the quarter deck, and even his enemies can never charge him with these questionable qualities. There all officer fired with vigour and ambition. He has often and often urged her to call, but his persuasions have failed. Whenever he has Belton Park in rather a gloomy mood after all. Lady Ribson quite expects Katie on this last evening, and while she welcomes the Admiral, she looks over his shoulder

The Admiral sets out early on his homeward journey; his thoughts still turn to Katie, but they have grown softer, more tender. The OLD gloom has passed from his spirit; the interview with Lady Ribson has calmed his ruffied thoughts; his reserve and pride have altogether melted down, and he longs to press his darling to his heart and forgive all her follies. The curiously cut costume suits her wonderfully well; the dress of azure silk falls in rich bright folds; her bodice glitters with gold and gems; and her hair turned back in its own luxuriant wealth of tresser, has no ornament but a diamond cluster. The mellowed rays from gas jets, hidden by the curtains, fall full on her head, and she shines out as though surrounded by a strange un-

But presently a single turn of his head changes his glance of For it is admiration into one of surprise and anger. In the shade of a gigantic azalea he spies Captain Walter Reeves, standing in an attitude of celm listening enjoyment. Instantly the Admiral's eye flashes with indignation. How dares Walter Reeves to be here, in his wife's drawing-room, when he ought to be miles away out on the stormy seas ?

In an instant the offender is called out of the room, and Sir Herbert demands to know why he has disobeyed orders by staying on
