Believing him to be one of the expected guests, the servant conducted him to the drawing-room, where a number of persons were already assembled. Making by all druggists. himself perfectly at home, he had halfa-dozen people about him, laughing at his bon mots, before the host discovered that a stranger was present. 'I beg your pardon, sir, he said addressing the uninvited one, 'your name ? I did not quite catch it; servants are so incorrect. 'Smith, sir, Smith,' replied the unblushing Theodore, don't apologise; you are quite right sir, servants are great block heads. remember a most remarkable mistakes.' But really, sir, interrupted the host mildly, 'I did not anticipate the pleasure of Mr Smith's company to dinner. Whom do you suppose you are addressing f 'Mr Thompson, of course,' answered Hook, 'an old friend of my father's. I received a kind invitation from you yesterday, on my arrival from Liverpool, to dine with Kingston, containing 200 acres. For partiyou to-day, family party, come in boots, culars apply to Rev. J. Brock, Sydenham ou said.' The host at once disclaimed Street, or the name of Thompson, or any knowledge of the vivacious Smith. 'Good heavens then I have come to the wrong house, exclaimed the hoaxer, my dear sir, how can I apologise ? so awkward too, and I have asked a friend to call for me.' The old gentleman, probably thinking so witty a personage excellent addition to his party, LIVERPOOL begged him to remain. With a profusion of apologies. Hook at first pretended to decline- ultimately accepted. Everybody was delighted with him, all the evening he kept up a constant fire of wit New Coloured Kid Gloves at 35c. In the midst of these the door opened and, true to his appointment, in walked Terry, at the sight of whom, striking a new key, and sang :--I'm very much pleased with your fare, Your cellar's as fine as your cook; My friend's Mr Terry, the player;

And I'm Mr Theodore Hook. And 'that name,' said Lockhart 'was already enough to put any wig in Guildhall out of curl.' One day after riding in some distance in a hackney-coach, he discoverd that he had ne money in his pocket to pay the fare. Catching sight of a friend upon the road, he took him up, hoping to borrow from him the sum required, but the friend was as impecunious as himself. Hook considered for a moment, then calling out to the coachman, desired him to drive to Mr --- 's, a well-known West-end surgeon. Arrived there, he sprang out of the coach, knocked loudly, and demanded of the servant who answered him If Mr So-and-so was within. The doctor was descending the stairs at the time. 'Oh, my dear sir, he cried in a wildly agitated voice, 'I trust you are not engaged-excuse the feelings of a husband, perhaps a father by this time-your attendance is required instantly at Mrs ---, No. -, such-and-such a street. But all such tricks sink into insignificance, besides the immortal Berners street hoax. The story is so well known that I must almost apologise for introducing it, yet no aketch of its hero would be complete without it. Walking down Berners street one day with Mathews, he remarked a particularly neat looking house. 'I - bet you a guinea, he said, 'that in one week that nice quiet dwelling shall be the most famous in all London. The bot was taken. Within a week Hook had written and dispatched 1,000 letters to different tradesmen, containing orders for goods to be delivered on one particular day, and as nearly as possible at one hour, from coals and potatoes, to books, prints, ices, jellies, 2,500 rasberry tarts, from half a hundred pastry cooks, &c., from dealers public that he has purchased the LIVERY whose shops and warehouses extended BUSINESS lately carried on by Mr F.
