SIGN OF THE GOLDEN BALL,

Fades the Daylight. BY E. NORMAN GUNNISON.

Fades the daylight, and the shadows Slowly gather on the lawn ; Now the night falls on the meadows, And the light of day is gone.

In the darkness which enfolds me Tender memories come once more-How each thought enchains and holds me Of the dear ones gone before,

Not in pain and not in sorrow Think I of the loved ones gone : Every night has still a morrow, Darkness but precedes the dawn. Were it not for heart-ties riven, For the friends that come no more, There would be no hope of heaven In the bright forevermore.

So, while shadows darken o'er me. Sit I at the close of day ; Loved, lost features are before me, Faces which have passed away ; Voices which made happy laughter Come again in tones of love ; Sweetly echoes follow after-Twilight angels bend above.

Is it daylight which is fading ;

Light of day which now must flee? It is but the happy shading Of a brighter day to be. So when twilight dreams have found me, Twilight voices fill the air.

Loved, lost beings gather round me, And their forms are passing fair.

A Story for the Little Children.

St. Nicholas for August has an extravagant little story by Fleta Forrester, "The Moon from a Frog's Point of view," with capital illustrations by H. L. Stephens. It runs as follows:

'Miss Frog sat in the cool of the evening, under a plantain-leaf, by the side of her blue and placid lake. "The day had been excessively warm, and so, as she sat, she gracefully waved
